Second, Mr. Adet “protests against the violation of the 17th article of the treaty, in contempt of which, Eng- "lish vessels, which had made prize on Frenchmen, have been admitted into the ports of the United States.” The grounds of this part of the 17th article, for which Mr. Adet, after his predecessor, Mr. Fauchet, contends, is this: That, if a Frenchman, has, a vessel in our ports, which is made prize of a French vessel, such ship of war is to be allowed no shelter or refuge in our ports, unless she is driven in through stress of weather; and then she is to be made to depart as soon as possible. On the contrary, the construc- tion of the rule, as expressed in the letter of the 5th of September, 1793, which had influence in the proceedings, in the prize causes in question. If, then, the 17th article of the French treaty has been violated, this, no American citizen will be inclined to believe; and we might suppose, that the consideration of such controversies by the courts of the United States, is not the act of an enemy, of which the Federal Courts, have all deliberately concurred in the violation. Neither the rules adopted by the President, nor the act of Congress, have made a new law respecting such prizes: they have only directed the modes of proceeding to fill our neutral duties, agreeably to the universal law of nations. The judges have applied this law; but not without due attention to the obligations of our treaties, which they regard as supreme laws of the land.

On the 9th of September, 1793, the Secretary of State thus expressed to the British minister the determination of the President and the government of the United States to admit into our ports:

First, in cases of urgent necessity: Second, in cases of comfort and convenience; and, Third, in the time they choose to continue; and though the admission of prizes and privateers of France is exclusive, yet it is the effect of cause & c.

In support of the construction of the treaty, it has been observed, that “the first part of the seventeenth article relates to French ships of war and privateers entering our ports with their prizes: the second contrasts the situation of the enemies of France, by forbidding such as shall have made prize of the French, intimating, from this construction, that there is a case which is to be distinguished from others. The 17th article, the convention and observances I will add, that, if the literal construction contended for by the French ministers were admitted, then, although the public ships of war which had made prize of French people or property, would be excluded from our ports, yet the prizes of such public ships might be received, and they might be sold too; for the prohibition in the 17th article extends only to French privateers and privateers of the French privateers only...* Letter of June 8, 1795.  } twentieth article of the treaty applies only to privateers and their prizes; while the Government of the United States judged that the seventeenth article was included in the prohibitions made by France of privateers. If the 20th article, without an express provision for privateers, they would doubtless have been comprehended in one provision with the privateers in the 2nd article: for privateers are thereby excluded, whether they come with or without prizes. But public ships of war are not comprehended, or at all referred to in the twenty-second article; whence the conclusion is fair, that it was not intended to make them liable to the fine or penalty. And it is evident, that the employers of privateers might have induced them only when they would come into our ports with their prizes; this last clause of the same article being in its form opposed to the first clause, which admits the entrance of French ships with their prizes. Besides, if a public ship of war of the enemies of France comes into our ports without any prize, how is it to be known whether she had been employed as a privateer? It is the duty of the people of the United States to examine the particular facts to determine and pronounce on the fact? But if she comes with a prize, the case presents no difficulty; she brings with her the evidence which goes to the exclusion of her and her prize.

I must now advert to some others of Mr. Adet's charges against the Government of the United States.

First. "It is not within the province of the American Congress to apprehend the agents of the rebel and proscribed princes." Is there any thing in this unjustifiable or extraordinary? Was it easy for a nation distant as ours, to obtain promptly such accurate information as would enable it to estimate the varying condition of France? In 1791, the constitution formed by the constituent assembly was accepted by Louis XVI., who was not taken prisoner till the 21st of March. Congress sent a congratulatory address to the King of the French, their congratulations on the occasion. In August, 1792, the King was suspended. In September, royalty was abolished; and in January, 1793, Louis XVI., tried and condemned by the Convention, suffered the penalty of the law. In the midst of all this, what could we do but wait for the public reports, and even then only when we knew that a minister had arrived in the United States. This promptitude in deciding a leading question does not bear any strong marks of hesitation. And was there no merit in this ready determination to acknowledge the French republic? Had it been before acknowledged by any Power on the globe? How long did France hesitate to acknowledge the republic of the United States? After the war had faired within the circle of our American Justice. After the capture of a whole British army appeared to have established our independence. But of this more hereafter. In matters of importance, and what could be more important than the decision of a neutral and allied nation on the annual war or peace of the United States? To refuse to protect all deliberation, even on points which do not obviously present difficulties? Will not prudence dictate to him who is to decide great national questions, rather to deliberate long as to reach the consequences of hasty decisions?

Second. "It made an insidious proclamation of neutrality." I have already remarked that this proclamation received the pointed approbation of Congress; and I might truly add, of the great body of the citizens of the United States. And what was the general object of this proclamation? To preserve us in a state of peace. And have not the ministers of France declared that their Government did not desire war with us? And how was peace to be preserved? It was by the duty of the Chief Executive to inform the citizens of this to our citizens, and to inform them what acts would be deemed departures from their neutrality? This was done by the proclamation. It declared it to be the duty, interest, and disposition, of the United States, to adopt and pursue a conduct friendly and impartial toward the belligerent Powers. The French, in their proclamation, had applied the same principles; they declared that at the same time every citizen should render himself liable to punishment or forfeiture under the law of nations, by committing or abetting hostilities against any of those Powers, or by carrying to any of them articles deemed contraband of war, would receive the protection of the United States against such punishment and forfeitures; and that the President was to have the power to prevent the departure from the United States of those citizens who should violate the laws of war, or who might, by that act, bring the United States into a state of war with any of the Powers, or the King of Tunis, or any of them. To what in all this can the epithet insidious be applied? On the contrary, is not the whole transaction stamped with condor and good faith?

Third. "By its checmieries, it abandoned French privateers to its courts of justice." Abandoned them to its courts of justice! Sir, you know many of the judges personally, and all of them by reputation, and that their characters need no vindication from such an imputation. They are judges with whose administration of justice our own citizens are satisfied; and we believe they may challenge the world to furnish a proof that they have not administered impartial justice. We have no hesitation in saying to the French ministers, formerly published, joined to those now furnished you, with the other documents accompanying them, will show how loudly they can complain of the proceedings in our courts, and at the same time with how much justice.

Fourth. "It eluded the amicable mediation of the republic for the breaking of its chains at Algiers." We did not entertain any doubt of the friendly disposition of the French republic to aid us in this business. What was really done we have never known. You will find, however, Mr. Fauchet's letter of June 4, 1794, and the annexed title of the letter on p. 65, to which I allude. The information on the subject of Mr. Fauchet's letter, in "little from Europe," probably never arrived; at least it was never communicated to our Government. There is surely in the Secretary's answer no evidence that our Government were unwilling to mediate the conclusion of the republic. On the contrary, we have relied upon it to aid our negotiations with the Barbary Powers. Accordingly, when Colonel Humphreys went from hence in 1795, clothed with powers for negotiating peace with those States, he was particularly instructed to solicit the mediation of the French republic; and for that purpose only, he went from Lisbon to Paris, where, through our minister, the committee of public safety manifested a desire to contribute to the amicable conclusion of the late war. The ministers of Mr. Fauchet authorized to depute Joseph Donaldson, Esq. (who had been appointed consul of the United States for Tunis and Tripoli, and who went with Colonel Humphreys from America) to negotiate immediately a treaty with Algiers; for, in a country where a negation depended on so many contingencies, it was of the last importance to be ready to mediate. By that means, whatever was the result of the negociation, the United States might be authorized to depute Joseph Donaldson, Esq. (who had been appointed consul of the United States for Tunis and Tripoli, and who went with Colonel Humphreys from America) to negotiate immediately a treaty with Algiers; for, in a country where a negation depended on so many contingencies, it was of the last importance to be ready to mediate. punish acts in breach of it, and to restore property taken by force within its limits. Were the armed vessel of any nation to carry away one of our own from the wharves of Philadelphia, and to choose to call it a prize, would this exclude us from the right of redressing the wrong? Were it the vessel of another nation, are we not equally bound to protect it, while within our limits? Were it seized in any other waters, or on the shores of the United States, the right of redress, if it would be in effect a violation of that law upon the will of a foreign consul, or on negotiation with diplomatic agents."

The same reasoning will apply to captures made by illegal privateers; that is, by such as were armed and equipped in the ports of the United States; for it being by the law of nations, as well as our constitution, and, as a national enactment, the only provisions intended to prevent the law of nations, and to restrain the acts of such armaments done in violation of its rights and in defiance of its authority. And such were the armaments made by the French People in the ports of the United States. And the most effectual means of defense was to constitute prizes, by not permitting them to proceed; if, indeed, that, in some cases, the irritated subjects or public agents of nations whose property was taken by French privateers, might commence vexatious prosecutions; but this is no more than happens frequently among our own citizens, and in every nation in the world; and the only restraints on the vindictive passions of men, in fact, is the power which the laws are vested in, to punish every violator of the laws by a public prosecutor to pay to the injured party. If, as Mr. Adet asserts, damages have in two cases only been granted by the courts to French privateers, even when the decisions have been in their favor, it has arisen from their own conduct, or the omission of their counsels. But if the maritime circumstances, or the jurisdiction over them of having violated the laws, either by illegally arming in our ports, or making the captures within our jurisdiction. If, on the other hand, they have, in the event of contrary decisions, been always condemned to pay damages, we may venture to say it was because they were always in the wrong.

No one will find sufficient ground to impeach the judgment or integrity of their courts.

Sixth. "It suffered England, by insulting its neutrality, to interrupt its commerce with France."

That our commerce has been interrupted by the armed vessels of England, and sometimes with circumstances of insult, we certainly shall not attempt to deny; the universal resentment and indignation excited by those injuries were the more the reason for being attended to as an object of policy. But to insinuate by the word "suffered") all its acts most forcibly contradicts. It was because of those aggressions that preparations for war were commenced; and to demand satisfaction for them was the leading object of Mr. Jay's mission. It is only the arrangement of the final settlement at London. But if by "suffered," Mr. Adet means that we did not arm, that is, make war on England, to obtain the indemnification, when humanity, and the law of nations, prescribed the mode of previous peacable demand— to these very principles we may appeal for our justification: and if it is necessary to go farther, we say, "It is for you to make war, in what manner and at what time, and under what circumstances, when and what is most proper for us to repel an injury. To deny us this right of judgment is to deny our independence. We have not been insensible either to our honor or our interest. If we have manifested much long suffering, we have not been singular. Neutral nations very commonly endure many temporary evils; because these appear light when compared with the calamities of war: and they look forward, as we have done, to a remit when returning justice may redress their wrongs. This period, we trust, will arrive in regard to those we are now suffering from the French republic. If a nation not bound to us by treaty, and between whom and ourselves actual circumstances and many events have interposed, would interpose in judgment in our favor, it would be considered as a judgment. We may here properly inquire, what could have been the understanding of the parties on this point, when the treaty of 1778 was made between France and the United States. She knew that, notwithstanding the extent of our country, and its rapid increase in population, many years must elapse before we could form a powerful navy to protect our commerce and commerce; particularly as she was acquainted with the maxims and measures of England, towards the commerce of neutral nations, in all her wars with France. And if, knowing these things, France then expected that, in all subsequent wars, we should compel the maritime Powers in general, and Great Britain in particular, to admit our commerce to perfect freedom, then, instead of a treaty and commercial convention, when France, before entering into war, she would have demanded from us a stipulation that, in every future war in which she should be engaged with any other maritime Power, we also should engage in it as her associate. But this is a condition which France was too just to demand, and to which the United States would never have agreed.

Seventh. "Notwithstanding the faith of treaties, it gave an asylum to these same English, who, after having insulted her flag, pillaged her citizens, came also to brave the American people in their ports, and to take a station whence to cruise, on a favorable opportunity, against the French."

The renewal of the complaints of his predecessor, Mr. Faucet, and the vindication of the Government will appear in the answers and communications from the Secretary to State to that minister, in the year 1784, and 1793. The cases particularly noticed were those of the British frigate Topsham and her prize l'Esperance, having herself, and her prize la Proroger. The Thetis, with her French prizes la Prevoyance and la Rambouillet, being in the graces of the 30th of May, 1793. Facts or circumstances as subjects of inquiry, which of course is precluded. That of the Topsham and her prize appears to have been the first case of the kind in which the Executive of the United States and those of the particular States were called into interference; and therefore, it will not be thought extraordinary if the Executive of Virginia was unprepared with arrangements to give instant effect to the stipulation of the 17th article of the treaty of 1778, forbidding an asylum to armed vessels of the enemies of France and their prizes. What delay took place seems to have been the result of accidents, certainly not of design. And by letters from this Department, the executives were earnestly pressed to take the necessary order for prompt execution, in future, of this part of the treaty. But why should the French ministers complain with such energy, that a British ship of war, with her prize, remained in one of our ports, during, perhaps, twenty or forty and twenty days, when, against the requests and orders of the Executive, and in violation of the stipulation of the 17th article of the treaty of 1778, cruised in the coast and enter our harbors, thence, on favorable opportunities, to cruise against their enemies? The Columbia or Carmania, continued her unlawful acts for more than a year.

After all the zealous remonstrances of Mr. Fauchet, now renewed by Mr. Adet, about the captures of the French corvette I'Esperance, and the American frigate Constitution, with her prize l'Esperance, the President of the United States was not so prepared and unprepared with arrangements as imprudent in the captors, but rather seemed to consider the introduction of the prisoners made on that occasion, so amenable to a place where the exchange would be effected, as an act of power, the misfortune of losing the vessel."

The Governor of Virginia went personally to the French consul, at Norfolk, for information concerning this declared violation of the treaty, but "received none which appeared to justify the uneasiness occasioned by that event, chargeing no circumstance as improper in the captors, but rather seemed to consider the introduction of the prisoners made on that occasion, so amenable to a place where the exchange would be effected, as an act of power, the misfortune of losing the vessel."

Letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Morris, August 16, 1793.
had captured her fifteen leagues from the shore: the weather being very tempestuous, a lieutenant, with a sufficient number of men only to navigate her, (not being half the complement the French had in her) were sent on board from the Resolution and Argonaut, and, so soon as the weather permitted those ships to supply her with water and provisions, I sent her to sea, that I might give her my guard to bring her. I then notified the French Admiral of humanity to the French prisoners, whom, having had a long voyage and many perils, I felt it my duty to rescue them. Mr. Senoford Norfolk as soon as prudence would permit; otherwise they must have been kept prisoners on board, the whole winter, and sent to Halifax in the spring, nor was she equipped or armed then, in any manner whatever nor did the British fleets, throughout the whole month of August, as Genet is learnt to have informed her, which is customary, and absolutely necessary in all captures; otherwise, if retaken by the enemy, he might be considered as a pirate.

Eighth. "It might be said that it appended their (the English) audacity; all submission to their will; it allowed the French ships from the fresh overtures to a commercial negotiation made by Mr. Adet. The first notices of them are found in memoranda of facts dated the 27th and 29th of June, 1793, and subscribed by the Secretary of State. By these it appears that, on the 13th of June Mr. Adet arrived at Philadelphia. On the 15th Mr. Faucet introduced a copy of the tariff of the treaty of commerce, and to declare to the Government and the necessity of their having a representative here disposed to respect the laws and authority of the country, and to do the best for their interest which these would permit; and when it was only an anxious regard for those interests, and a desire that they might not suffer, which induced the Executive, in the mean time, to receive the proposed offer of a commercial connection, on the 29th of June Mr. Adet was reminded of the promised communication. He said it was copying, and gave reason that he should forward it on that day; but on that day nothing was received.

The 22d, Mr. Jefferson wrote an interview, in which he observed that he brought with him the commercial decrees which Mr. Genet had formerly propounded to our Government, and was instructed to negotiate a commercial treaty upon their basis. He was asked whether he had any documents to communicate. He replied that he would send them that night. He said that he had been in receipt of the treaty for Great Britain. He observed that it was understood that the United States had disabled themselves from entering into a new commercial treaty, upon a liberal scale, with France. The Secretary answered that he had determined, before he came, to ask the permission of the President to communicate to him a copy of the treaty; and then he might say in what part he supposed that any impropriety with respect to France forebearing, that public opinion was not to be lost, if he would present the designs of his enemies: His Majesty accordingly, therefore, to take into consideration, at length, the interests of the Congress."

"The commissioners from the United States proposed to the King a treaty of amity and commerce, and an alliance, offensive and defensive, by which His Majesty should engage, not only to acknowledge and to guaranty the independence of the United States, but also to guaranty and defend it by force of arms. The King ordered an armistice to be made, and he could not do other, unless upon the condition that it did not belong to him to acknowledge it, because he had not any right to judge of its; neither could he guaranty it, as he did not intend to enter into a war for its support. His Majesty, in consequence, refused an offensive alliance, and the American commissioners, to prevent a treaty of commerce and a defensive alliance, which was the object of the congress, which was then formed in Paris, and His Majesty, at that time, had formed the design of attacking France. His Majesty thought he ought to enter into an alliance with the United States, eventual and purely defensive. The stipulations in this second treaty are, in substance, that, if France should be attacked by the court of London, before the cessation of hostilities between that court and its allies, the United States and the great powers of Europe shall publicly declare war upon France. That the King should guaranty the independence and sovereignty of the United States; and that he should not lay down his arms till it should be acknowledged by Great Britain.

Thus it is manifest, there was neither to be decrease the number of her enemies by attacking France, in which it would be as truly the interest of France as of the United States to make it a common cause. The last treaty remained secret, because it was not in force at the time of concluding it; but that of commerce was notified at the court of London, March 13, 1778. The first words of the notification are these: the United States of North America, who are in full possession of independence, &c. The whole paragraph has already quoted. The notification further expressed "the King, being determined to protect effectually the lawful commerce of his subjects, and to maintain the dignity of his flag, His Majesty has, in consequence, taken eventual measures, in concert with the United States of North America." The court of London chose to consider this notification as a declaration of war, of which they accuse the King as being the author, and represent him as the violator of laws divine and human, &c &c. "The act, however, which has drawn upon the King such odious imputations, is this, the two following propositions: if the Americans had the public possession of their independence; the second, that the King had the right to look upon this independence as existing, without being obliged to examine the legality of it, and that no forbade him to form connections with the Americans."

The King, therefore, being much scared by the fruitless attempts of the colonies to obtain redress from their mother country, in the mode of supplication, had induced them to league together to maintain their privileges, sword in hand, and soon after published the solemn act whereby they declared independence, saying, "This act, which is of the 4th of July, 1776, issued from the joint committee of London to give way to her resentments; she displayed her power to the world by declaring, that as she had the right and means to exercise it, she would exercise it; But instead of exercising them by force of arms, she refused to exercise them by force of peace. Her subjects were not only instructed in the art of exercising them, but also in the art of not exercising them."

"The act, however, which has drawn so odious imputations upon the King, is this, that he has not only refused to exercise his right of exercising his power, but also that he has refused to exercise his right of not exercising his power, for the purpose of avoiding the necessity of exercising it."

"The act, however, which has drawn such odious imputations upon the King, is this, that he has not only refused to exercise his right of exercising his power, but also that he has refused to exercise his right of not exercising his power, for the purpose of avoiding the necessity of exercising it."

"To the completion of the justification of His Majesty, nothing remains but to examine whether what are called reasons of State could have determined His Majesty to connect himself with the Americans. To treat this question with all the clearness of which it is susceptible, the political interests of France must be viewed under two different relations; the first respects the other Powers of Europe; the second respects Great Britain."

"In treating with the Americans, after they became independent, the King exercised the right inherent in his sovereignty, with no other view than to put an end to the predominant power which England abused in every quarter of the globe. The Observations then suggest, that by this conduct, the King has essentially watched over the interest of all the sovereigns of Europe, 'by contributing to restrain a power which has always carried to excess the abuse of her resources.'"

The court of London having charged the King of France with ambition, and the project of demolishing the power of England, it will be necessary, as well for the individual interest of France as for that of all Europe, to examine the conduct of the King, it the truth of this view, and the motives which induced Him, and His Majesty's dispositions and without reservations against the enterprises of such a power; so that, the only means of being secured from it, was to seize the opportunity of diminishing it."

"It may then be truly said, that, on examination of the conduct of the King, it was not only just and lawful, but absolutely necessary, as well for the individual interest of France as for that of all Europe."

I will trouble you with but one more extract from the justificatory Observations of the court of France.

"To receive the objections of the court of London, it is necessary to make a dissection of the motives which induced the conduct of the King, the British ministry maintain that he entered into treaty with the Americans, not because he feared the political view of Government, but because he wished to desarree the American states, and to make them contribute to the expenses of their wars; but it was, without doubt, for the sake of this assertion, that the British ministry endeavored to show the King was, in fact, attached to the interests of the United States; because, if it was, it would be an admission of that he was a party to the secret treaty, or at least of that he was in league with the United States; and it would be a manifest admission of that the British ministry had been wrong in asserting that the King was attached to the interests of the United States; it might, with greater truth, be said, that this research did not coincide with their plan of defence. The King is willing to spare the British ministry a task so disagreeable and embarrassing, by observing for them, that the conversations which led to the treaties of the 6th of February, 1778, were considerably posterior to..."
to the capitulation of General Burgoyne. Now, it is notorious that this event elevated the courage and the hopes of the Americans as much as it dejected the British. The repugnance to the proceedings of Congress, after this period, so disastrous to the British, it has not been, and could not have been, for any other reason but because he thought, with the United States, that their independence was henceforward irrecoverable.

In these letters, from the Observations of the court of France; we see an open avowal of her motives for entering into treaties with the United States during our Revolution. But do such motives afford any strong claims to our gratitude? She rejoiced at the prospect of a final separation of the thirteen colonies from Great Britain; she saw them erected, by their solemn Declaration, into independent States; but, during near three years of our contest, she has not only failed to perceive the advantages attending such a separation, but has even treated France as a country in whose interest it would have been for her to promote the British cause. This event took place in the capture of a whole British army. "Then the King listened to the propositions of Congress, because he thought with the United States that their independence was irrecoverable. He then treated with the Americans, as with the preponderant power over which England reigns."

"A diminution of this power, (says the King) the tranquillity and happiness of Europe have, for a long time, required." "The only means of being secured from it, was to seize the opportunity of diminishing it" and he did seize it, "because his safety, the interest of his people, invariable policy, and, above all, the secret prospects the British did not seem capable of the necessary establishment.

After these repeated declarations on the part of France that her only view, in contracting engagements with the United States, was to diminish the British power, and thereby promote the safety and interest of her own people and the tranquillity of Europe, very unexpected, indeed, are the modern claims of boundless and perpetual gratitude. Nevertheless, animadverted, as we always have been, with sincere desires to maintain those useful and friendly connexions with France which had their foundation in our Revolution, we should have remained silent on these claims, had not the frequency and manner in which they have been urged, compelled their discussion. We are not now disposed to question the importance of the gains actually derived from France in the course of our Revolution; nor to retract the grateful acknowledgments that all America has, from that time, offered to that nation; we were in the habit of expressing our gratitude to her for the benefits which we received, although they resulted from her exertions to advance her own interest and secure her own safety. But if those benefits had been rendered from motives not disinterested, if they had been rendered from a combination of considerations more powerful or more unceasing than ours, we should have seen more reason to expect a return.

The British government, indeed, being convinced of the wish of France to diminish the British power, consistently supported the American claims; and the British minister, in his instructions to Lord Dartmouth, declares, "It would be more for the interest of Great Britain, as well as of France, that there should be a separation of the United States from the British dominions."

After all these representations, and the previous knowledge which the French government has acknowledged, and the conduct of France, we should have been the more surprised at the surprise which we have heard to expect from the British minister. We have been told, that "the independence of the United States is nowhere elaborated. Agreeably to their instructions from Congress, to take advice of the court of France, the commissioners communicated Mr. Oswald's declarations of an intention to come to terms." The Court of France, we are informed, were convinced that "France was sufficiently that it was such a one as we might have expected it would be: "that an acknowledgment of our independence, instead of preceding, must, in the natural course of things, be the effect of the treaty." This opinion the count continued, from time to time, to repeat. In short, "it was evident the count did not wish to see our independence acknowledged by Britain until the representatives he had made all its uses of." Mr. Jay still remained unmoved. He conferred with Mr. Oswald, and "urged, in the strongest terms, the great improvidence and consequently the utter impossibility of our ever treating with Great Britain on any other than an equal footing" and told him plainly that he (Mr. Jay) would have no concern in any negotiation in which we were not considered as an independent power.

It was on this occasion that Mr. Oswald communicated to Mr. Jay this article of his instructions: "In case you find the American commissioners are not at liberty to treat on any terms short of independence, you are to declare to them, to the full of our abilities, and peace disposing us to purchase it at the price of acceding to the complete independence of the Thirteen Colonies.

The British ministry approved of this communication; but still were for treating with us as colonies, and making an acknowledgment of our independence only on articles of the treaty. Mr. Jay's discernment discovered the source complained of. Mr. Oswald, by dismissing himself or with our minister, of the British court, let out our independence was to the negotiation of the treaty; and mentioned it, with his reasons, to Mr. Oswald; who, far from contradicting Mr. Jay's inference, told him a fact which confirmed that opinion that it originated in the court of France, and was communicated to that of London, then in Paris, to treat of peace between France and Great Britain. Mr. Jay then explained to Mr. Oswald what he supposed to be the real policy of the French court, and showed him that it was the interest of Britain to render us as independent on France as we were resolved to be on Britain." Mr. Oswald was convinced. Mr. Jay reminded him of the several resolutions of Congress, passed at different periods, not to treat with British commissioners on any other footing than that of absolute independence; and proposed to give to him in writing what he had before expressed in conversation—his determination not to treat but on the footing of equality. Mr. Oswald preferred having it in writing. Mr. Jay prepared the draught of a letter, to be signed by him and Doctor Franklin, expressing their determination not to treat but on terms of equality, as an independent people, and that their president, the count de Vergennes. Mr. Oswald, who had already been a party to the negotiation, and, therefore, rather imprudent: for that, in case Britain should remain firm, and future circumstances should compel us to submit to their mode of treating, we should do it with an ill grace, after such a decided and preposterous refusal, and besides, the Doctor seemed much struck by the instructions from Congress, to be guided by the advice of the French court. Neither of these considerations affected Mr. Jay: for, as to the first, he could not conceive of any event which would render it proper, and therefore possible for America to treat in any other character than as an independent nation. And, as to the second, he could not believe that Congress intended they should make an acknowledgment of independence, but falsely believing that we had firmly resolved not to treat on more humble terms.

With the copy of this draught Mr. Jay gave Mr. Oswald copies of the various resolutions of Congress which enforced their adherence to their independence. These papers Mr. Oswald sent by express to London, and warmly recommended a new commission, to meet, after all other delay."
Mr. Jay having afterwards ascertained that the Count de Vergennes had sent a confidential agent to London, but whose journey was intended to have been a secret, for purposes evidently hostile to the interests of the United States, determined immediately to counteract the project, by an agent on whom he could rely, to make to the court of London such representations as he thought the occasion demanded. He succeeded in and in about two weeks, Mr. Oswalt, was sent to France, for which the United States, agreed to the declaration of independence, the United States, as free and independent, had full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, &c. That, by the act of confederation, the style of the confederation was declared to be, the United States of America, and by that act Congress were vested with the sole power of declaring war, and the raising and regulating the Army, and the determining the form of the government. Mr. Jay remarked, that, being right and in fact free and independent States, their Representatives in Congress granted a commission to certain gentlemen, of whom Dr. Franklin and he were two, in their name to confer, treat, and conclude, with any powers of the United States, in their capacity, as the United States. The business with which the complection, at the same time Congress manifested their readiness to attend to such terms of peace as might consist with the honor of independent nations but the honor of an independent nation forbade their treating in an underhand capacity. Even the distant relations, with whom we were treated as an independent nation, required that we should not degrade ourselves when going to treat with their enemy. And why, then, should her ministers desire us to do it? Especially when the treaty of defensive alliance declared the "essential and direct end of it was to maintain effectually the liberty, sovereignty, and independence, absolute and unlimited, of the United States of America, from all foreign combinations and confederations, by whatever name called. And, to enable the United States, and the United States, engaged not to lay down their arms until the independence of the United States should be attained. The explicit acknowledgment of their independence by Great Britain would show that, for the essential and direct object of the defensive alliance was to enable the United States to support themselves, they had nothing to fear, or anything to lose, but certain security to numerical equality of forces; and if this was an essential condition of peace, it must have been a condition which whose sake we were not bound to postpone the offered peace. We have seen the explicit avowal of the King of France, that he entered into a treaty with the United States with the view to promote the safety and interest of his king and country, and our mutual relations with them and the United States. It was clear that, in the opinion of Great Britain, it became apparent that there would be no objection to our dependence on France, particularly in "leaving the King master of the terms of the treaty of peace." And to keep us thus far dependent, was manifestly the object of certain measures of the French court, calculated to deprive the United States of an immense western territory, of the navigation of the Mississippi, and of the fisheries, except on our own coast. A combination of facts and circumstances leaves no doubt of the intentions of the French court, as to the objects above mentioned. I cannot undertake the lengthy detail, and will only just mention, in regard to territory, what was proposed by the French minister and one whose interest in the Mississippi would have induced him to promote, his own sentiments, or that he was not acting by the direction of the French court. He proposed what he called a conciliatory line between the United States and Spain. This was to begin at the division of East from West Florida, and run thence to Fort Toulouse on the river Alabama, thence by different courses to Cumberland river, and down that course to the sea. It was not to be a circle of navigation, but a line which the United States could turn to, or not turn to, as they thought fit, and which the Spanish commerce might be brought into, without their consent, and the navigation of the United States must be forever suspended, because they would soon acquire a strength which it was probable they would be eager to abuse. "The same Machiavellian principle influenced the operations of the war for independence: the same duplicity reigned over the negotiations for peace. We see, then, that, in forming connexion with us in 1779, the court of France, the actual organ of the nation, had no regard to the interest of the United States but that their real object was, by seizing the occasion of dismembering the British empire, to diminish the power of a formidable rival and that, when, after we had carried on a distressing war for seven years, the great object for which we had contended, independence, was within our reach, that court endeavored to postpone the acknowledgment of it by Great Britain, and eventually to deprive us of its finest fruits—a just extent of territory, the navigation of the Mississippi, and the fisheries. Such being the motives and conduct of France, what inspir'd us with truly patriotic sentiments towards that nation? They inspired us with no less warm friendship for Americans to Frenchmen. We were engaged in a common cause against Great Britain. We received losses we were aided by troops and ships in attacking and conquering the common enemy, in the bosom of our country; and this association in war produced acquainances and per- sons of friendship. Perceiving these benefits, we gave way to our feelings, without inquiring into the motives from which they were rendered.

But why are we so often reminded of the debt of gratitude? Is it really because more than gratitude, because compensation is expected to cancel it? If compensation is the object, the treaty of alliance has solved the claim. It is the only means by which the contracting parties discharge that, being resolved to fulfill, each on its own part, the clauses and conditions of the present treaty of alliance, according to its own power and circumstances, there shall be no offer of claim of compensation, on one side or the other, whatever may be the event of the war." What are we to notice as charge and accusation? Mr. Jay alleged, that we have not offered to France the succors which friendship might have given, without compromising the Government. If Mr. Aedt had specified the kind of succors which might thus have been offered, we could better judge of the correctness of his assertion. FOREIGN RELATIONS.

prosecute them? Never." Yet the very letter from Mr. Genet to the Secretary of State, in which, and its enclosures, Mr. Adet has found this subject of complaint, suggests a different conclusion: "I learn, with pleasure, (says Mr. Genet) by your letter, of the 23d of this month, [June, 1793,] that the government of Georgia has caused to be stopped a vessel armed in that State, for the purpose of cruizing against the French, and that the persons in her are to be presumed to be French subjects." I shall say but a few words on the subject of the letters of which Mr. Adet complained that they remained unanswered. The first (of September 28, 1793) contained those reproachful insinuations which were recited in my letter of the 1st of November last. Why were these introduced? I believe they were not to be interpreted to mean nothing; but an answer was expected, since the French ministers had promised to avoid irritations; the answer was not sent. It was deemed of the less consequence, seeing, in my letter to Mr. Monroe, of the 13th of September, 1793, the sentiments and reasoning of the Government, on that and other subjects relating to France. But the French (sensibly and fairly) expected an answer. Mr. Adet, the French Consul himself, and it was hoped that the information given in that letter, and in others written to him the preceding summer, would have furnished materials (and that these materials would have been timely used) for such representations as would have satisfied the French Government that the United States, in forming the treaty with Great Britain, had not engaged in any indirect way; and neither by that treaty, nor any other act, had infringed a single article of our treaties with France.

On the subject of the impresses of our seamen, mentioned in Mr. Adet's letters of March and April, 1796, I shall only add, that nothing was more noticeably than that there were frequent cases of impress. The French had the same right as the British to impress American seamen, and the United States had no power to interfere, except in the case of consular officers, or the United States had a right, which was granted to them by the treaty, to demand removal from our British Consuls. The first, in Mr. Pinckney's note to Lord Grenville, in August, 1793, which was published here that year in the same collection of State papers with Mr. Jefferson's letter of September 7th,* which Mr. Adet has quoted, and on the fifth page next succeeding it, we find, the following: "Under this head, it may be observed, that for want of arrangements being made for the security of American seamen in the ports of this country, (England) they are subject to the various hardships Mr. Pinckney has so frequently detailed to Lord Grenville." And, in the next page, in his letter to Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Pinckney says: "the protection afforded our seamen remains also on the same footing: they (this country) propose nothing to secure them from impress, but the proof they will not dispense with." To remove, as far as possible, the embarrassments arising from this cause, and more effectually to protect our seamen, was the object of a bill pending in Congress, and the subject of public debate at the time I received Mr. Adet's letter by the post. Consequently the Convention of 1795 was determined that the Government did not assent, but, on the contrary, that they resisted the impressment of American seamen: and this resistance has been continued; consequently we cannot be charged on this ground with a violation of our neutrality.

As to the effects of contraband, now not renewed by Mr. Adet, is that against the Government for permitting the purchase and exportation of horses, by British agents, in the course of the last winter and spring. The correspondence on this subject is lengthy, and yet the question lies within a very narrow compass.

Perhaps no rule is now better established than that nations which have a right to trade freely with nations at war have also a right to the use of their commerce, and selling to them all kinds of merchandise, or permitting them to exchange those same commodities in the neutral territory; in the latter case, not refusing to one Power at what it permits another to purchase; with this exception in respect to articles contraband, that, if the crossing of one of the belligerent Powers meet at sea within neutral territory, laden with such commodities as are destined to the ports of their enemies, the neutral vessel may be captured, and the contraband goods will be lawful prize to the captors; but the residue of their cargo, and the vessels themselves, are to be discharged.

But, if there were any doubt on this point, under the law of nations, there can be none in relation to France and the United States; for this is the only rule which specially regards the uncertainty of the laws of 1793 from restraining the trade of either party remaining neutral, while the other is engaged in war, provides regulations agreeably to which it should be conducted.

The 12th and 13th articles authorize either party that is at war, to stop the neutral merchant vessels of the other destined to the ports of an enemy, on reasonable grounds of suspicion, concerning the voyage or the laden. If, on examining the ship's papers, it appears there are any contraband goods on board, "consigned for a port under the obedience of his enemies," she may be carried into port, and the contraband articles may, by regular proceedings in the admiralty, be confiscated: "saving, always, as well the ship itself as any other goods found therein, which, by the nature of the articles, shall be deemed free; neither may they be detained on pretence of their being, as it were, infected by the prohibited goods, much less shall they be confiscated as lawful prize." It further provides that, if the master of the neutral ship shall be willing to deliver the contraband goods to the captor, and the latter receives them, then the contraband goods are to be returned to the neutral ship, and both shall be discharged. But, if not willing; further: if the neutral ship shall have on board the enemies of the other, "they are not to be taken out unless they are soldiers in actual service.

These articles are so explicit, it may seem strange that a doubt should arise concerning them. I presume no one doubts that if the French, adhering to the preceding provisions of the treaty, demanded that the Government should stop the exportation of horses by the British, upon the principle that it was a neutral duty required by the law of nations, an answer was given to his demands, in which the regulations of our treaty with France were particularly brought into view, as well as the impossibility of stopping them. Mr. Adet, however, after some time, renewed his claims again kept the contrary point of sight. An answer was given to these renewed claims; and we heard no more on the subject until the French privateers in the West Indies began to capture American vessels which had board; we find among the documents on this subject the copy of a decree of the citizens Victor Hugues and Lobas, the special agents of the executive department in the Windward Islands, collecting an American vessel and her entire cargo, for having a small number of horses on board—not bound to their enemy's but to a neutral port. And these special agents grounded their decree on the advice they received from Mr. Adet, under the date of 14th Messidor, being July 31, 1796, that the British had put a price on the French horses, and the master had them in his pocket, and would have brought them home, but, for the re-"
And by the maritime law of France,* prizes, except they are taken from her enemies, can stay in her ports no more than twenty-four hours, unless compelled by tempest to remain longer; and the sales of such prizes are forbidden, under severe penalties. But, notwithstanding the certainty of our right to forbid the sales of prizes in our ports, we are withholding the express legal command of the chief justice of the United States. He has refused to act in behalf of the United States, and the British agents, on the 31st of May last, have sold the prize vessel, and the sale received the formal sanction of the French consuls. Yet, even this affair has been made a subject of complaint by Mr. Aete, because the decision of that port refused a clearance to the vessel, the agent of the United States, and because he also delayed until a new case, he should get advice to permit the exportation of the cargo of the prize ship, which, on a survey, had been reported to be irreparable.

The French minister has discovered an aptitude to complain. I may cite, as instances, his letters of the 9th January and 3d of March, 1796; the former, because the colors of France, which he had presented to the United States, were not permanently fixed and displayed before Congress; the latter, because some prints of almanacs or other periodical publications in the United States, in arranging the names of the foreign ministers and agents residing in the ports, have placed in defiance of the authority of the United States, and because he also delayed until a new case, he should get advice to permit the exportation of the cargo of the prize ship, which, on a survey, had been reported to be irreparable.

First complaint. "The minister of France, having directed his agents to take the colors of France, which he had presented to the United States, to be permanently fixed and displayed before Congress; and because some prints of almanacs or other periodical publications in the United States, in arranging the names of the foreign ministers and agents residing in the ports, have placed in defiance of the authority of the United States, and because he also desired his agents to be directed to take advice to permit the exportation of the cargo of the prize ship, which, on a survey, had been reported to be irreparable.

"I have considered the 12th article of the convention between his late Most Christian Majesty and the United States of America, and also the act of Congress concerning consuls and vice consuls, as far as it prescribes the duty of marshals of the United States; and I am my opinion that the marshals are not bound by law to execute any sentence of a French consuls, arising under the said article.

"RICHARD HARRISON,

Attorney United States for the New York district.

"PHILADELPHIA, March 14, 1794.

"I have considered the convention and act above referred to, and I perfectly coincide in the opinion given by the attorney of the United States for the district of New York.

"W. M. BRADFORD.

The other complaint under this head is, that the judges who are charged (by an act of Congress) to issue warrants of arrest against deserters from French vessels, have required the original ship's logs, to prove that the offenders alleged to have deserted were a part of the crew, in the contempt of the 5th article, which admits in the tribunals of both countries, copies certified by the consuls.

If we look at the 9th article of the consular treaty, we shall see that the consuls who demand the arrests of deserters from vessels of their nation, must prove, by an exhibition of the registers of the vessel, or ship's roll, that those men were a part of the crew." It is apparent that the original roll, and not a copy, is here referred to; nor, indeed, is the contrary pretended; but it is said that the 5th article admits certified consular copies, as evidence in the courts of both nations. But the 5th article appears to have no relation to the subject of the 9th. It stipulates that the consuls shall respectively have the exclusive right of receiving in their consulates, from the captains and owners of vessels, the declarations, as they may consider necessary, of the masters and owners of vessels, heathen merchants of their nation, who may choose to make there, even their testaments and other disposals by last will; and the copies of the said acts, duly authenticated by the said consuls, under the seal of their consulate, shall receive faith in law, equally as their originals would have done, without an act of Congress (or a warrant therefor) as a vessel. But the 5th article requires the evidence of a private agreement between the captain of a vessel and his crew; and when he alleges that any of them have deserted, the 9th article requires this original evidence of the fact to be produced to the judge, as the ground on which he shall issue his warrant to arrest them. And this is the construction put on this article by the judges; and, for want I know, without any diversity of opinion. The difference alleged by Mr. Fauchet in one of his letters to the Secretary of State, I have inquired into; and, find he was under a mistake. And the mistake, probably, from this circumstance, that when, from the information of the consul, there was danger that the deserter would escape, unless instantly apprehended, the judge hastily issued his warrant to arrest, and bring before him the alleged deserter: but, when brought, that judge has not committed the man, or delivered him to the consul, unless the original roll was produced, to prove him one of the ship's crew.

As to the outrage against Mr. Fauchet by the Africa man of war, in attempting to seize him and his papers, with the order of desertion and the Captain's commissions, and the Captain's warrant was given for the ship's papers, measures more efficacious could have been taken by the Executive than those which were adopted, to obtain satisfaction. After waiting a reasonable time for explanations on the part of Captain Home, and of Mr. Moore, the English vice consul, and receiving none, the President revoked the exequatur of the vice consul, and desired the Governor of Rhode Island, where the ship had been, to arrest the Captain Home and demand the demand of the President that he should immediately remove from a station within the jurisdiction of the United States, where he had violated their rights; and further, to make known to him that, in forty-eight hours after the requisition should be received, he would be expelled. Him, all intercourse with the citizen of France and the ship's crew, who the President has that he should immediately remove from a station within the jurisdiction of the United States, where he has violated their rights; and further, to make known to him that, in forty-eight hours after the requisition should be received, he would be expelled.

It is very true, the reverse of the British vice consul, was withdrawn expressly for his knowingly transmitting to the Governor of Rhode Island a most insulting letter from Captain Home; because, although he was on board the Africa when the attempt was made against Mr. Fauchet, the President had no evidence of his co-operation in the affair; and, although Mr. Fauchet, the President, was directed to remove from a station within the jurisdiction of the United States, where he had violated their rights; and further, to make known to him that, in forty-eight hours after the requisition should be received, he would be expelled.

Although the subject of M. de la Croix's third and last complaint (the British treaty) has been already discussed, allow me here to make a few remarks. He says "it will be easy to prove that the King and his ministers, under the pretense of this treaty, have knowingly and evidently sacrificed their connexion with the republic, and the most essential and least contested prerogatives of neutrality." The reverse of what the minister considers so easy to prove, we think has been demonstrated. Our legally binding connexion with France we always considered as being formed by our treaty, and we say there is nothing in our treaty which we have not "equally" violated; and if individuals have at any time infringed them, the Government has been sincere and diligent in its endeavors to redress the wrong. If the ties of affection, of warm enthusiastic friendship, have been weakened, the cause is to be sought for not in the acts of the American Government, which have been constantly directed to the preservation of our constitution; and the ties of interest between France and the United States are stronger than ever. They are interwoven in our Revolution, and our partiality for the cause of liberty and self government, for which she engaged in her own, which made us endure numerous injuries, almost without complaining. We were not willing to ascribe to the republic the outrages of her ministers against the laws, the sovereignty, and the dignity of the United States, or the exceptionable style of their communications. Even when, for such flagrant aggressions, often repeated, we desired the recall of one of her ministers, it was only in the most soothing language; and in the mean time, lest the interest of the republic should suffer, he was permitted to exercise his functions in all cases in which those interests could be affected. When his successor arrived, he officially requested that the officer whose work might be apprehended, that he might be sent to France: but the Government, satisfied by his removal, declined the measure. Some irritations were experienced from that successor. What sensations have been produced by Mr. Adet's notes, your own feelings, on the perusal, will enable you to judge. If he intended to excite the general indignation of our citizens, he is not disappointed: but it is presumed he has not the object. After an exhibition of complaints in a style so exceptionable, he could add but one more improper act, that of publishing his notes in the newspapers: he had scarcely transmitted them to the Executive, before he forwarded them to the printer for publication.

From the last statement we may appear to have been as much concerned as the Minister of the United States to violate our treaty, or weaken our engagements with France: that whatever resistance it has opposed to the measures of her agents, the maintenance of the laws and sovereignty of the United States, and their neutral obligations, have rendered indispensable. That it has never acquiesced in any acts violating our rights or interfering with the advantages stipulated to France, but, on the contrary, has opposed them by all the means in its power: that it has withheld no succors from France that were compatible with the duties of neutrality to grant that as well by their independent political rights as by the express provisions of the commercial treaty with France, the United States were at full liberty to enter into commercial treaties with any other nation, and consequently, with Great Britain: that no facts, manifesting a partiality to that country, have been, and I add that none such can be, produced.

Of the propriety and justness of these conclusions, you will endeavor to satisfy the French Government; and, complying with the desire of one of our correspondents' days, during the last week, that you communicate the most sanguine expectations that they will be satisfied. We even hope that this has been already accomplished, and that you will be saved from the pain of renewing a discussion which the Government has entered upon with regret. Your mission and instructions prove its solicitude to have prevented this necessity, and the sincerity of your instructions; and the probability of your success in laying before the French Government complaints, by showing that they are groundless; to restore confidence, so unfortunately and injuriously impaired; to explain the relative interests of both countries, and the real sentiments of your own have been attended with success. And, as a consequence thereof, we rely on the repeal of the decrees and orders which expose our commerce to indefinite injuries, which militate with the obligations of treaties, and our rights as a neutral nation.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic, to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State.

LOCATION AT PHILADELPHIA.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of the French republic, in conformity to the orders of his Government, has the honor of transmitting to the Secretary of State of the United States, a resolution taken by the executive directory of the French republic, on the 14th Messidor, 4th year, [July 2, 1796] relative to the conduct which the ships of war of the republic are to hold towards neutral vessels. The flag of the republic will treat the flag of neutrals in the same manner as they shall suffer it to be treated by the English.
The sentiments which the American Government have manifested to the undersigned minister plenipotentiary, do further permit him to light, this measure, as far as it may concern the United States, and that they will also feel that it is dictated by imperative circumstances, Great Britain, during the war she has carried on against the republic, has not ceased using every means in her power to add to that scourge, scourges still more terrible: she has used the well known liberty of the French nation to the detriment of that nation, and France, in the observance of her treaty knowing that it was a principle of the republic to respect the flags of all nations, and that it was the beginning of the war, has caused neutral vessels, and in particular American vessels, to be detained; taken upon themselves the public property of the United States, could find only a real distinction articles of property to be respected as American property, English property found on board American vessels. They had a right, under this consideration, the reputation of America, the property on board neutral vessels, declaring, at the same time, that the measure should cease when the English general order. But the said rescript to the several powers, which had excepted, on the 33d of the same month, the Americans from the operation of this general order. The measure I have just spoken of, the English did not abandon the plan they had formed, and continued to stop and carry the ports all American vessels bound to French ports, or returning from them.

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary perceives it his duty to remark to the Secretary of State, that the undersigned minister plenipotentiary expresses his intention to officers of the republic have nothing to fear as to the treatment of their flag by the French, and that, if they are subjected to the bolder of neutrality, they cause the rights of that neutrality to be respected by the English, the republic will respect them. But if, in the cases of the British war Powers, these advantages, or motives, they should suffer the English to stop, turn it to their advantage, and turn it to the French, acting in the same manner as the English?

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary embraces this opportunity of reiterating to the Secretary of State the assurance of his esteem and inform him, at the same time, that he will cause this note to be printed, in order to publicly known the motives which, at the present juncture, influence his Government.

Extract from the Register of the Ministers of the 4th Directory, 4th year of the French Republic, one and indivisible.

The executive directory, considering that, if it becomes the faith of the French nation to respect treaties or conventions which secure to the flags of some neutral or friendly Powers, commercial advantages, the result of which, either through the weakness of our Powers, those, or, through fear, through interested views, or through whatever motives, would, in fact, warrant the inexcusation of the article in which they were stipulated, decrees as follows:

All neutral or allied Powers shall, without delay, be notified that the flag of the French republic will treat neutral vessels, either as to confiscation, as to searches, or capture, in the same manner as they shall suffer the English to treat them.

P. A. ADET.
SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 27th ultimo, covering a decree of the executive directory of the French republic, concerning the commerce of neutral nations.

It is stated in this decree that no restrictions are to be imposed by the French government on the trade of neutral nations, and that no decrees of every kind, whether of a public or private nature, are to be promulgated which would be inconsistent with the rights secured to them by the law of nations, and others, between which the French republican treaties have imposed special obligations. Where no treaties exist, the republic, by seizing and confiscating the property of their enemies found on board neutral vessels, would only exercise an acknowledged right under the law of nations. If, towards such neutral nations, the French Directory should give a new form to the French citizen, it would not be perfectly gratuitous. The United States, by virtue of their treaty of commerce with France, stand on different ground.

In the year 1778, France voluntarily entered into a commercial treaty with us, on principles of perfect reciprocity, and expressly stipulating that "free ships should make free goods;" that is, if France should be at war with any nation with whom the United States should be at peace, the property of their citizens, whether on board neutral vessels (soldiers in actual service excepted) found on board the vessels of the United States, were to be free from capture. That, on the other hand, if the United States should engage in war with any nation, while France remained at peace, then the goods (except contraband) and persons of enemies of France, without subjecting them to capture. This is plainly expressed in the twenty-third article of that treaty, and demonstrates that the reciprocity thereby stipulated was to operate at different periods; that is, at one time in favor of one of the contracting parties, and at the other at times. At the present time, the United States being at peace, they possess by the treaty the right of carrying the goods of neutrals of France, without subjecting them to capture. But what do the spirit of the decree of the executive directory and the current of your observations require? That the United States should now gratuitously renounce this right. And what reason is assigned for denying us the enjoyment of this right? Your own words furnish the answer.

"France adopts the same principles of the religion of wisdom, to the end that all nations could enter into a firm and lasting union, founded on reciprocal rights, which caused to be respected, as American property. English property found on board American vessels." This requisition, and the reason assigned to support it, alike excite surprise. The American Government, sir, conscious of the dignity of its intentions, of its impartial observance of the law of nations, and the regard to treaties, cannot, for a moment, admit, that it has forfeited the right to claim a reciprocal observance of stipulations, on the part of the French republic, whose friendship, moreover, it has ever cultivated with perfect sincerity. This right, formerly infringed by a decree of the National Convention, was recognized anew by the repeal of that decree. Why insist, sir, on the principle of a public jure beli, and not let the United States decide for themselves the rules of commerce by the British Government? On the contrary, we possess recent official information that no new orders have been issued. The captures made by the British, of American vessels having French property on board, are warranted by the law of nations. The force and operation of this law was contemplated by France and the United States when they formed their treaty of commerce. If our Government should determine, for the sake of preserving harmony, silence was preferred to a comment upon these insinuations.

You are also pleased to refer to your letters of March and April last, relative to impressment of American seamen by British Vessels, and the action the United States have taken in regard to that subject. This is perfectly known to you, and we have taken to obtain satisfaction. This, sir, was a matter which concerned only that Government. As an independent nation, we were not bound to render an account to any other, of the measures we deemed proper for the protection of our own citizens, so long as there was not the slightest ground to suspect that the Government ever acquiesced in any aggression. But permit me to recite to the subject of the decree of the executive directory. As before observed, we are officially informed that the British Government have issued no new orders for capturing the vessels of the United States. We are also officially informed that, on the appearance of the notification of that decree, the minister of the United States at Paris applied for information, "whether orders were issued for the seizure of neutral vessels, and was informed that no such order was issued; and further, that none such would be issued in case the British did not seize our vessels." This communication from the minister of the United States at Paris, to their minister in London, was dated the 25th of August. But the decree of the directory bears date the 14th Messor, answering to the second of July. These circumstances, together with some observations in your note, leave the American Government in a state of uncertainty as to the real intentions of the Government of France. Allow me, then, to ask, whether the British Government have assigned a state of neutrality to the recent British decrees, and any new restrictions on the part of the French republic? Whether the restrictions now exercised by the British Government are considered as a nature to justify a denial of those rights which are pledged to us by our treaty with your nation? Whether orders have been actually given to the ships of war and privateers of the French republic, to capture vessels of the United States, or have the British Government imposed any new restrictions on their United States? These questions, sir, you will see are highly interesting to the United States. It is with extreme concern that the Government finds itself reduced to the necessity of asking an explanation of this nature. And if it shall be informed that a new line of conduct is to be adopted towards the United States, on the part of the French republic, it shall be impossible for the United States to accept such a change of treaty, if the spirit, or the precise terms of these orders, are not published to the public.

I shall close this letter by one remark on the singularity of your causing the publication of your note. As it concerned the United States, it was properly addressed to its Government, to which alone pertained the right of communicating it, in such time and manner as it should think fit, to the citizens of the United States.

I am, sir, with great respect, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.
The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic, Mr. to Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

Philadelphia, 13 Brumaire, (3d November, 1796, 0. S.)

No. 4.

Sir: I hasten to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated 1st November, which was delivered to me last night, and which I find this morning in the newspapers.

I shall have the honor in a few days of furnishing you with more ample information upon the object of which it treats, and I shall feel permitted to add that the article of the executive directors, in which I had the honor to notify you, bears no mark of similitude with the supposed order in question in the letter from Mr. Monroe to Mr. Rufus King, which you cite, and which was made known to me by the newspapers.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my respectful esteem.

P. A. ADET.

Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic, to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

LEGATION AT PHILADELPHIA.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of the French republic, now fulfills to the Secretary of State of the United States a painful but sacred duty. He claims, in the name of American honor, in the name of the faith of treaties, the execution of that contract which assured to the United States their existence, and which France regarded as the pledge of the most sacred union between two people, the freest upon earth. In a word, he announces to the Secretary of State and makes known to his enemies, the friends of their country.

It would have been pleasing to the undersigned minister plenipotentiary to have only to express, on the present occasion, the attachment which his Government bears to the American people, the vows which it forms for their prosperity, for their happiness. His heart, therefore, is grieved at the circumstances which impose on him a different task. With regret he finds himself compelled to substitute for the declaration of friendship for the United States, the declaration of war.

With regret, also, his Government has ordered him to take that tone; but that very friendship has rendered it indispensable. Its obligations, sacred to men, are as sacred to Governments; and if a friend offended by a friend can justly complain, the Government of the United States, after the undersigned minister plenipotentiary shall have traced the catalogue of the grievances of the French republic, will not be surprised to see its directory manifesting their too just discontents.

When Europe rose up against the republic at its birth, menaced it with all the horrors of war and famine; when, on the other side, the French Republic, on the part of its enemies, put enemies, put in motion the most hideous and the most cruel, a sweet sentiment then mingled itself with those proud sentiments which the presence of danger, and the desire of repelling it, produced in their hearts. In America they saw friends. Those who went to brave tempests and death upon the ocean, forgot all dangers, in order to indulge the hope of that American continent, where, for the first time, the French colors had been displayed in favor of liberty. Under the guarantee of the law of nations, under the protecting shade of a solemn treaty, they expected to find in the ports of the United States an asylum as sure as at home; they thought, if I may use the expression, there to find a second country. The French Government thought as they did. Oh hope, worthy of a faithful people, how hast thou been deceived! So far from offering the French the succors which friendship might have given without compromising it, the American Government, in this respect, violated the letter of treaties.

The 17th article of the treaty of amity and commerce of 1778, states that French vessels of war, and those of the United States, as well as those which shall have been armed for war by individuals of the two States, may freely conduct, where they please, the prizes they shall have made upon their enemies, without being subject to any admiralty or other duty; without the said vessels, on entering into the harbors or ports of France, or of the United States, being liable to be arrested or seized, or the officers of those places taking cognizance of the validity of the said prizes; which may depart from the said liberty, the places are expressly added to the treaty, in which the captains of said vessels shall be obliged to show. And that, on the contrary, no shelter or refuge shall be given to those who shall have made prizes upon the French or Americans; and that, if they should be forced by stress of weather, or the danger of the sea, to enter, they shall be made to depart as soon as possible.

In contempt of these stipulations, the French privates have been arrested in the United States, as well as their prizes; the tribunals have taken cognizance of the validity or invalidity of these prizes. It was vain to seek to justify these proceedings under the pretext of the right of vindicating the compromised neutrality of the United States. The facts about to be stated will prove that this pretext has been the source of shocking persecutions against the French privates, and that the conduct of the Federal Government has been but a series of violations of the 17th article of the treaty of 1778.

On the 4th of August, 1793, a circular letter of the Secretary of the Treasury was sent to all the collectors of the customs. It accompanied regulations adopted by the President, prohibiting all armaments in favor of the belligerent Powers. These regulations immediately acquired the force of law, and the agents of the Government, and the tribunals, concurred in their execution. They gave them a retrospective effect, and caused to be seized in the ports of the United States the armed vessels and prizes which had come in prior to that time. But, even before these regulations, adopted by the President, had established any rule whatever upon the prohibition of armaments, the tribunals had already, by order of the Government, assumed the cognizance of prizes made by French vessels.

One of the predecessors of the undersigned protested against this, but in vain. The tribunals still continued their persecutions.

On the 3d of December, 1793, the President asked of Congress a law confirming the measures contained in the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, above mentioned. (No. 2.) This law was passed the 5th June, 1794.

What was its result? In consequence of this law, the greater part of the French privates have been arrested, as well as the vessels. Confronted with these extraordinary appearances, without the possibility of producing tangible demonstrations of their innocence, the French government called the attention of the American government to the necessity of a new treaty, of the existence of which we have been informed. By the information of the one consul of the Powers at war with the French republic; frequently upon that of sailors of the enemy Powers; sometimes according to the orders of the Governors, but often at the discretion and at the cost of those Powers, to whom the principle appears to be granted by the law, (No. 3.) that their conviction was sufficient to authorize them, without the examination of proof, to cause the privates to be prosecuted in virtue of the law above mentioned. (No. 4.)

When the ministers of the republic have asked justice of the Government for the vexations experienced by the privates, in contempt of the 17th article of the treaty, they have not obtained the satisfaction.

Thus when, on the 9th Fructidor, 3d year, (26th August, 1794) the predecessor of the undersigned addressed a complaint to the Government on this subject, the Secretary of State answered, on the 3d September, 1794, by a peremptory refusal.

Thus when, on the same minister, on the 27th Vendémiaire, 3d year, (17th October, 1794) reminded the Secretary of State of the means he had proposed to him for putting an end to the measures adopted against the French privates, when he caused him to see that this means, which consisted in requiring security from those who claimed the prizes as illegal, would prevent the enemies of the republic from instituting so many suits, of which they themselves perceived the injustice, he obtained no other answer than that his proposition relative to securities was inadmissible.
When, on the 13th Floréal, 3d year, the same minister expressed himself in these terms, in a letter to the Secretary of State: "You have alleged, sir, that the Executive of the United States cannot interfere in the affairs of which the tribunals have taken cognizance; in admitting this objection for all the business now in suit, I do not the less think that your Government could, by general measures, bring back the jurisdiction of the American tribunals over all cases which would have been committed by the parties who are now before the French courts. It is certain that with regard to the recovery of the negroes and the cargoes of the Priscilla, it would neither be necessary to violate the supreme law of the lands; it may make known that the facility with which your courts of admiralty admit, without distinction, all the chicanery which our enemies create against us, in the present war, is evidently contrary to the spirit of the treaty. The Federal Government has more reason for its concern, as its agent, at home or abroad, did it not notice the particular fact which has occasioned the note of citizen Frascati.

What was the undersigned minister plenipotentiary able to obtain in the affair of the Cassius and of the Vengerance? Nothing.

Government of the United States must have seen, however, by the claims which the ministers of the republic addressed to it, and by the great number of facts of which it has had a knowledge, how much the execution of the measures addressed to the President, and of the law of the 5th of June, 1794, was contrary to the 17th article of the treaty; how much the agency of the tribunals, who ought not to have any cognizance of the validity or invalidity of privateers, was contrary to the article of the treaty which states that the Government of the United States could not, without the consent of the French Government, be charged with the execution of the privileges of the privateers. But it was not evident that, when the Powers at war with the republic had the privilege, in virtue of the law of the 5th of June, 1794, of causing to be arrested the privateers and their prizes, of detaining them in the ports of the United States, of considering them as violating the laws of neutrality, they could be charged from this privilege an immense advantage to the detriment of France? Doubtless, it was of little import to them that sometimes the privateers obtained justice, in the last resort, if they detained the privateer for a length of time, and if, by these means, sheltered from their pursuit the commerce of the enemy of France. The neutrality of the United States, in this case, was also an advantage to the Federal Government, on seeing this state of things, should, out of respect to its neutrality and to treaties, have solicited from the Congress the means of conciliating the duties of the former with the obligations of the latter.

The Government very well knew how to solicit the law of the 5th June, 1794, that this law was to bear on foreign vessels, but at the same time, to the tribunals, in which decisions have been made, and which enables them to decide upon prizes. Why, on seeing the inconvenience of this law, has it not remedied to remedy them? Should it wait to be solicited on this head? Should it not anticipate all claims, and, when these were presented by the ministers of the republic, give it justice? Besides, if the Government had been impartial, as it has pretended to be, it would not have adopted that slow and circuitous mode, so favorable to the enemies of France, for deciding the cases relative to its neutrality; it would have preferred the measures proposed by Mr. Jefferson, on the 35th of June, 1793, to the minister of the republic. They have given the French Government the opportunity of committing a wrong, and of restoring to it, by the power. The Federal Government had decided questions which interested its neutrality, upon informations furnished by the State Governors and the agents of the republic; the prizes remained in the hands of the French consul until this decision took place; the stipulations of the 17th article of the treaty existed not violated; and the Government, at the same time, satisfied the obligations of duty and justice. In various cases of justice, the Federal Government, giving to the tribunals the right of taking cognizance of cases in which neutrality had been violated, did not the President, on the 21st of June, 1794, decide that the ship Ann, taken by the French in the names of the United States, should be delivered to the captors? On the 30th of July, 1794, did he not decide that the Pilgrim had been taken in the waters of the United States, and that, of course, she should be given up to the owners? In these cases, the President not only decided on matters of justice, which had been censured to the tribunals, but likewise gave a retrospective effect to his own decisions, and decided the preceding line of the United States, which was not notified to the minister of the republic till the 6th of November, 1793.

Not satisfied with permitting the 17th article of the treaty to be violated by its agents and tribunals, the Federal Government allowed the English to seize upon the advantages interdicted to them by that article. They armed in the waters of the United States, brought in and repaired their prizes, and, in a word, found in them a certain asylum.

Thus the English privateer Trusty, Captain Hall, was armed at Baltimore, to cruise against the French, and sailed, notwithstanding the complaints of the consul of the republic. At Charleston, one Bermudian vessel, several English vessels, and one Dutch vessel, from the 94th of May, to the 6th of June, 1793, took in cannon for their defence, and sailed without opposition.

What answer did the Government give to the representations of the minister of the French republic, in this regard? He had expressed the feeling of the French Government, and the French Government found it too suddenly; that it was not able to cause them to be stopped; but the treaty was not less violated. Some inhabitants of the United States had aided in these illegal armaments. What measures were taken against them? Was any search made to discover them—to prosecute them? Never; and yet the President of the United States, having received intelligence that the conditions contained in the treaty of Versailles seemed to contain, the French were arming in the ports of the United States, than the most energetic orders were sent for stopping these armaments. Even citizens of the United States were imprisoned upon suspicion that they had participated in them. The minister cannot omit citing here the following passage of a letter from the Secretary of State, Edmund Randolph, to Mr. Hammond, dated June 8, 1794: "On a suggestion of the citizens of the United States had taken part in the act, [he speaks of the armaments in the United States] one who was designated was instantly committed to prison for prosecution; one or two others have been since named and committed in like manner, and, should it appear that there were still others, no measures would be spared to bring them to justice." What more could the American Government do in favor of the English, if they had a similar treaty to that with France, and had been sole possessors of the advantages assured to her by positive stipulations?

However, in contempt of these very stipulations, the Argonaut, an English ship of war, in January, 1794, committed armed vessels by the French, and the vessel 11th of June, 1794, the English Government had repaired, in order to send her upon a cruise. Letters were in consequence written by the Secretary of State to the Governor of Virginia, and to Mr. Hammond. What was the result? Nothing. On the 99th of May, 1795, the Federal Government had not yet done anything positive as to the acts which produced the complaint of the minister. The Secretary of State had not heard that the arms were British arms, or that they were French arms; when they are verified, the Federal Government will not be in the rear of its obligations." To that has the repARATION demanded by the republic been limited.

What are we to think of these delays, when we see the officers of the Government acting with much activity against the French, on the slightest suspicion that they have violated the neutrality; when, in his letter of 9th April, 1794, the Secretary of State answers the complaints of the English minister: "We have received no intelligence of the particular facts to which you refer; but, to prevent all unnecessary circuit, in first inquiring into them, and next transmitting a decision, it was agreeable to the result, that the Minister, in his letter of February 1794, did the Federal Government conduct towards the autumn of 1794? The English frigate Tersiphere took the privateer La Montagne into the port of Norfolk. The French vice consul claimed the execution of the treaty, of the Government of the United States, and would not be satisfied with the answer of the American minister, who, in his capacity of the predecessor of the undersigned, the dispatches of the Lieutenant Governor, dated October 10, 1794; by which he announces that he ordered the commandant of the militia of Norfolk to make the necessary inquiries for enabling the Executive of Virginia to render to the republic of France that it had a right to expect. The result of these inquiries is not known. However, the fact about which the minister Frascati complained to the Secretary of State on account of the
When the Government of the United States had wished to maintain itself in that impartiality which its duties prescribed; if it had wished freely to execute the treaties; it would not have waited, every time that the English interest suggested it, to have its requirements. As no war was declared by the United States against the French, or by the French against the United States, as no war existed, as the question of war and peace was conducted on both sides, it was, in every event, the interest of the United States to maintain the neutrality which it had voluntarily assumed, and to wait the conclusion of the hostilities, which it did not hope would be long to continue. It was for the purpose of having the treaty of 1797, and of the new treaty which was about to be signed, and which it had been concluded should be modified, if necessary, on the same principles, that the American minister, M. de Rancé, was sent to London, and conducted the business of the treaty to its conclusion. He had represented that the United States had nothing to fear from the English, and that they expected nothing from them, in order to ensure, in return, the protection of the United States, and the assistance necessary to them against the French. The English government, on the contrary, placed their hopes in a treaty with the United States, which they expected would be the first step towards a peace; and which, in their opinion, would enable them to obtain, from the United States, what they had so long sought, when France was interested? Why, in fine, have the multiplied remonstrances of her ministers never produced the redress of grievances of which they complained?

The envoy of the undersigned minister plenipotentiary claimed the execution of the 17th article of the treaty, interdicting the entry into the American ports of English vessels which should have made prizes upon the French; when he cited this simple and formal stipulation: "On the contrary, neither asylum nor refuge shall be given, in the ports or harbors of France, or of the United States, to vessels which shall have made prizes of the French, or which shall have been armed by them; or, contrarily, shall be permitted to the French vessels, or officers, to enter, or to depart from the American ports, or to discharge the prizes which the French government shall have used to make them depart as soon as possible." The Secretary of State, in order to give the English minister the satisfaction which he desired, interpreted this article in their favor. "But it would be uncandid to conceal from this House, that this article, which is in the twain clauses, that the vessels forbidden are those which bring their prizes with them. It has been considered as necessary, for the withholding of protection or succor to the prizes themselves; had it been otherwise, it would have been superfluous to have prohibited [in the 28th article, foreign private-]

He said, moreover, in his letter of the 29th of May, 1795: "But, on the 3d of August, the President declared his intentions of contracting with English vessels to enter, thereby forbidden from our waters, except those which should have made prize of the people or property of France, contrary to the provisions of the treaty, to which they were entitled, in order to have their prizes in the American ports, and to discharge them there themselves. The 17th article of the treaty, interdicting the entry into the American ports of English vessels which should have made prizes upon the French, or of the United States, from the American ports, of the United States, and their prizes into the respective parts of the two Powers, of selling their prizes, or of discharging all or part of their cargo there, is, therefore, applied to the prizes, whereas, the 17th applies to the capturing vessels. Did it not exist, the enemy might, either in the French, or of the United States, of the said article, therefore, applies to the prizes; whilst the 17th applies to the capturing vessels. But, it was not necessary, then, to have recourse to a formal stipulation, when the vessels which had made prizes on the French or Americans, are admitted into the ports of France or of the United States, for the sake of the cases, they might, in this case, have conceived themselves authorized to dispose of their prizes, to sell them, or to discharge them. But, this was not the case, for the trade had been conducted by the undersigned, the stipulations of the 17th article have been violated. They have been equally so, by the admission, in sundry ports, of the Thetis and Hussar frigates, which captured the Pravenvoyage and la Raison, French store ships, and by admitting, in the last instance, this ship la Raison, prize to the Thetis, into the ports of the United States. The President of the United States, by the 28th article, pretends to support his construction of the 17th article, which does this article contain. A prohibition of the entry of English vessels into the American ports, were it not the case that those vessels have been armed in the ports of the United States, or of the United States, or of the United States, or of the United States, and have disposed of their prizes, in the American ports, or of the United States. The 17th article, therefore, applies to the vessels, and the capturing vessels. In this article, therefore, applies to the vessels, whereas the 17th applies to the capturing vessels. Did it not exist, the enemy might, either in the French, or of the United States, of the said article, therefore, applies to the prizes; whilst the 17th applies to the capturing vessels. But, it was not necessary, then, to have recourse to a formal stipulation, when the vessels which had made prizes on the French or Americans, are admitted into the ports of France or of the United States, for the sake of the cases, they might, in this case, have conceived themselves authorized to dispose of their prizes, to sell them, or to discharge them. But, this was not the case, for the trade had been conducted by the undersigned, the stipulations of the 17th article have been violated. They have been equally so, by the admission, in sundry ports, of the Thetis and Hussar frigates, which captured the Pravenvoyage and la Raison, French store ships, and by admitting, in the last instance, this ship la Raison, prize to the Thetis, into the ports of the United States. But admitting, for a moment, the construction gratuitously given by the Secretary of State to the 17th article of the treaty of 1778, this article has not the less been violated, when the Argonaut, which had quitted Hampton Roads in order to capture the Princesse, was destroyed for that prize; when the Tercenche was suffered to bring their cargoes, and to discharge them in the privateer la Montagne. In vain were sought, in the resources of the privateers, in the resources of the privateers, the only means of obtaining indemnification for the losses which the American commerce had sustained. What has this negotiation produced? A treaty of amity and commerce, which deprives France of all the advantages stipulated in a previous treaty.

In fact, all that could render the neutrality profitable to England, and injurious to France, is combined in this treaty. How, in fact, a secret relation with neutral states are entirely broken, by the abandonment of the modern public law on contraband—a law which England had consecrated in every treaty she had entered into. France and Prussia had also consecrated in their treaties with France, Holland, Sweden, and Prussia. From the new arrangements, with regard to England, the free carriage of the articles for the equipment and armament of the English vessels, is granted exclusively to England.

By the 17th article of the treaty of Versailles, the United States have the liberty of freely carrying on commerce with the enemies of France. The 24th article of the treaty with Holland, the 10th article of the treaty with Sweden, and the 13th article of the treaty with Prussia, contain the same stipulation. This last article gives even more extensive privileges to United States, by permitting their ports to carry to the enemies of this Power, the articles enumerated in the list of such as are contraband of war, without their being liable to confiscation. But, by the 17th article of the London, for the articles arming and equipping vessels are declared contraband of war. The Government of the United States has, therefore, by this stipulation, granted to the English a right which they had refused.
In vain will it be objected that France, having the right, by her treaty of 1778, to enjoy all the advantages in commerce and navigation, which the United States have granted to England, is not injured by the stipulations of the treaty of 1794, relative to contraband of war, as they become common to her. But the right secured to her, by the said treaty, of 1778, to enter into the commerce of the United States, in their treaty with France, have made stipulations entirely opposite to the just cited; whilst her vessels of war are bound to respect the American flag going to English possessions, the English ships in their ports American vessels going to the ports of France; subject them to decisions more or less arbitrary, and often condemn them, in account of the name alone, of their owners; by which means, all the commercial relations between the United States and France are entirely suspended. What American will venture to send vessels into French ports? What commerce will he venture to undertake with the French possessions, when it will be certain that his funds, either in going to, or returning from, them, will involve such hazard as renders every transaction with the latter country dangerous; and which, if it is licit, as the public safety may require, would be done without the consent of foreign nations, cannot be licit, in a commercial sense, when the public welfare may require it. What motive could induce a man who, under the protection of the American republic, has been happy enough to acquire a title to riches, to hazard them in a war, when he may have a ready market for them, and must, in that case, have them, in the manner in which they are, readily received? Would he not prefer Great Britain to France for his speculations? In virtue of the treaty of London, and by the course of things, would not the commerce of the United States pass entirely to England, during the present war?

After having consented to such conditions, the American Government cannot pretend to impartiality; it cannot say that it has maintained an equal neutrality between France and England, since it has granted to Great Britain advantages denied to France. But every one of these advantages granted to England was a real injury to the republic; and the Americans, in their treatises, with all the candor which admits of the bestowal of advantages, did not object to a belligerent Power advantages which it refused to another, it is clear that the Government of the United States, after having made its treaty with Great Britain, ceased to be neutral, when it opposed itself to the participation by France, in the favors granted to the English.

In consequence, the undersigned minister plenipotentiary again declares, that the executive directory has just ordered the vessels of war and privateers of the republic to treat American vessels in the same manner as they suffer the English to treat them.

Were the treaty of London out of the question, the measure the executive directory now takes, would not be less concomitant to it. The undersigned minister plenipotentiary has developed to the Secretary of State, in his note of the 6th Brumaire last, [27th of October, 1795.] principles which leave no doubt in this respect, and which the answer of the Secretary of State, is far from being destructive. (No. 5.) But the stipulations of treaties now come to the support of general principles. The republic calls for the execution of the second article of the treaty of 1778, that France and the United States mutually engage not to grant any particular favor, as to navigation or commerce, which shall, not immediately become common to the other party. The Government of the United States having, by the treaty of London, sacrificed to England the freedom of their flag, the property of the enemies of England, and naval stores, France, by her treaty, is authorized to claim the same advantage, to make use of it, and the United States have no right to complain.

Certainly it would have been more conformable to the designs of France, to her principles, to see the American flag floating over the ocean, which she shares with her, and which should belong to neutral nations; but in order to that, it was necessary that the American Government should know how to maintain that neutrality; it was necessary that it preserved it, free from violation by Great Britain; and if now the execution of the measures which the directory is obliged to adopt give rise to complications and incidents contrary to the interests of their country, have brought the French Government to use the prerogatives granted to the English.

When, after having suffered to be violated the treaties which unite it to France, the Government of the United States can assiccc itself with England, and has rendered its neutrality as useful to that Power as it is now injurious to its ancient ally, could the republic be silent? Her outraged generosity, her wounded honor, prevented her silence were weakness and, strong in her principles as in her proceedings, she should demand her unacknowledged services in its defense.

Thus, therefore, as it results from the statement which the undersigned minister plenipotentiary has just given:

1st. That the 17th article of the treaty of 1778, has been violated; that, in contempt of this article, the American tribunals have been permitted to take cognizance of the validity of prizes made by French ships of war and privateers, under pretext of original armament or augmentation of armament in the United States, or of capture within the jurisdictional line of the United States.

2d. That the said article 17 has been equally violated by the admission of English vessels in the ports of the United States which had made prizes on Frenchmen, and by the admission of their prizes:

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary, in the name, and by the orders of the executive directory, protests against the violation of this article, of the 17th of the treaty of 1778, in contempt of which article 17, said to be violated, in contempt of the said article, it has been taken cognizance of the validity of prizes made by French ships of war, or privateers, under pretext of original armament, or augmentation of armament, in the United States; or of capture within the jurisdictional line; claims the replevy of all seizures, and the repeal of all other judicial acts exercised on those prizes; and protests, moreover, against all operations for the capture of the said prizes in the 17th article of the said treaty.

Further, the undersigned minister plenipotentiary protests against the violation of the seventeenth article of the treaty of 1778, in contempt of which article 17, which has been violated, has been admitted into the jurisdictional line of the United States, after having been only the property of the French privateers, and not of the owners, and in contempt of the said treaty the distinction which Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, has established in his letter of 29th May, 1795, in which he admits only the exclusion of the English vessels which bring in their prices, and wishes to except from the prohibitory measure, the vessels which, after having made prizes, enter the ports of the United States. The undersigned plenipotentiary declares, that the minister plenipotentiary regards the treaty of commerce concluded with Great Britain as a violation of the treaty made with France in 1778, and equivalent to a treaty of alliance with Great Britain; and that, justified offended at the conduct which the American Government has hitherto maintained, they have given him orders to suspend, from this moment, his ministerial functions with the Federal Government.

The same cause which for a long time prevented the executive directory from allowing their just resistance to break forth, has also tempered its effects. Neither hatred, nor the desire of vengeance, rapidly succeeded to establish in the heart of France; the name of America still excites sweet emotions in it, notwithstanding the wrongs
K^RANCE.

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary therefore announces, that the Government of the United States, and the Congress enabled by them, hereby declare their determination to be the friends of peace with the United States, but as a mark of just discontent, which is to last until the Government of the United States returns to sentiments, and to measures, more conformable to the interests of the alliance, and the sworn friendship between the two nations.

This alliance was always dear to Frenchmen; they have done every thing to tighten its bonds. The Government of the United States, on the contrary, has sought to break them. Scearely had the war broken out between France and England, when America was alone invited to the commerce of the Antilles. All the colonial ports were open to her. The United States, however, having sent cargoes of provisions to England, the British Packet put to sea, and left behind it, as a mark of the English violated the freedom of the neutral flag, the Convention was obliged to use. Her Majesty, who had ordered that neutral vessels should be seized by the ships of the republic; she excepted the Americans from this measure. Forced, against her inclination, to make it bear on them also, she waited, with impatience, for the moment to present her sentiments, and to demand an indemnity from the United States. It was only when she revoked her law relative to the arrest of their vessels. Soon, also, the committee of public safety gave orders to respect the American flag. In every circumstance, France sought the means of proving to the United States the sincerity of her friendship. When the Federal Government complained of the conduct of one of the predecessors of the under-signed, they gave only the complaints of the Government of the United States, and immediately gave the most striking reparation.

Let the annals of the French revolution be opened; let the minutes of that august sitting be seen, in which the National Convention received the minister of the United States into its bosom; the addresses which it styled them sprang from hearts full of affection for an allied people: they breathed the feelings which dictated them, and the American minister found himself in the midst of his friends. What joy did not the American flag inspire when it waved unfurled in the French Senate? Tender tears trickled from each eye; every one looked at it with amaze-ments! The sense of this momentous event, the spirit which it unfurled, are enough to take all spirit from the French; it might be said that it applauded their audacity; all submission to their will, it allowed the French colonies to be declared in a state of blockade, and its citizens interdicted the right to trading with them. (No. 5.) It eluded all the advances made by the republic for renewing the treaties of commerce, upon a more favorable footing to both nations. (No. 9.) It excused itself on the most frivolous pretexta; whilst it anticipated Great Britain, by soliciting a treaty in which, prostituting its neutrality, it sacrificed France to her enemies, or rather looked upon her as obliterated from the map of the world; it forgot the services that she had rendered, and the constant gratitude of the United States.

Alas! time has not yet demolished the fortifications with which the English roughened this country, nor those the Americans raised for their defence; their half rounded summits still appear in every quarter; amidst plains—on the tops of mountains. The traveller need not search for the ditch which served to encompass them; it is still open under his feet, and the first sound or footfall makes movements of British fury, still to be found. Men still exist who can say, here a ferocious Englishman slaughtered my father; there my wife tore her bleeding hair from the hands of an unbridled Englishman. Alas! the soldiers who fell under the sword of the Britons are not yet reduced to dust; the laborer, in turning up his field, still draws a breath, of the earth that is saturated by the blood of man, with tears of tenderness and gratitude. He recollects that his fields, now covered with rich harvests, have been moistened with French blood; while every thing around the inhabitants of this country animates them to speak of the tyranny of Great Britain, and of the genero-ty of the men of America, who, having once thirsted for death to the victory of their country, are now avenging it, in the estimation of the United States, with its having cemented its blood with the independence of the United States. It was at this moment their Government, with a treaty of amnesty with their ancient tyrant, the implacable enemy of their anciently. O! Americans, covered with noble scars! O! you who have so often flown to death and to victory with French soldiers! You who know those generous victors, who are as decorated with honor as you are in arms! Consult them to-day, to know what you experience; recollect, at the same time, that, if magnanimous souls with liveliness arrest an affront, they also know how to forget one. Let your Government return to itself, and you will still find in Frenchmen faithful friends and generous allies.

(No. 2.) Extract of the President's speech to the House of Representatives, 3d December, 1793.—"As soon as the war in Europe had embraced those Powers with whom the United States have the most extensive relations, there was reason to apprehend that our intercourse with them might be interrupted, and our disposition was drawn into question by the suspicions too often entertained by belligerent nations. It seemed, therefore, to be my duty, from the best account I have been able to obtain of any of the parties, and to obtain, by a declaration of the existing legal state of things, an easier admission of our rights to the intuitions belonging to the United States. Under these impressions the proclamation which will be laid before you, was "In this posture of affairs, both new and delicate, I resolved to adopt general rules, which shall conform to the treaties, and assert the privileges of the United States. These were reduced into a system, which will be communicated to you. Although I have not thought myself at liberty to forbid the sale of the prizes, permitted by our good intentions, to be the duty of the government of the United States, I have assigned to the American flag the protection, under any of the parties, and by a declaration of the existing legal state of things, an easier admission of our rights to the intuitions belonging to the United States. Under these impressions the proclamation which will be laid before you, was..."

"Whatever those remedies may be, they will be well administered by the judiciary, who possess a long established course of investigation, effectual process, and officers in the habit of executing it."

(No. 3.) The undersigned minister plenipotentiary having complained to the Secretary of State that the attorney of the United States had caused the privateer La Vengeance to be arrested, without an affidavit or other authority, the undersigned was required to explain why this step had been taken. The undersigned, Mr. Troup, had addressed him in the absence of Mr. Harrison, district attorney of New York, in which is this passage:

"As to the suit against the privateer, it was commenced by Mr. Harrison, as attorney for the district, upon an official disclosure to him, by the Spanish consul, of the presence of the vessel in the harbor. Mr. Harrison, upon receiving this disclosure, felt himself, as he thought, authorized by considerations which, as a public officer, he could not resist, to proceed against the privateer under the third section of the act of Congress, entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for the allowing of legal process in suits for property taken in the use of such privateers," to bring in a suit against any person who shall give information of the offence, and the other half to the use of the United States. No person having appeared in quality of informer, to institute the suit, Mr. Harrison, according to the course of the common law, filed an information, in behalf of the United States, solely against the privateer, as you will perceive by the copy herewith transmitted. The undersigned, however, required the information to be founded upon any previous affidavit or evidence of the truth of the matters alleged in it. The filing of an information is an act entirely in the discretion of the officer entrusted with the power of doing it; and, if he should always, in every case, take it upon him to vouch for the existence of an all-important fact, his act, becoming a public document, and received as evidence, might be used against him in some future instance. Mr. Harrison has acted from the best of his judgment upon the duty of his office, after officially obtaining information from a public officer, who conceived himself likewise bound, by a sense of duty, to communicate the information."

On the 29th September, 1815, the undersigned minister plenipotentiary renewed the charge, on the 3d Vendémiaire, 4th year (29th September, 1815) to the Secretary of State, and still complained that an affidavit was not required to cause a privateer to be arrested—be [the minister] expressed himself in these words:

"But I again recur to the assertion that an affidavit is not necessary for ordering the arrest of a vessel."

Yet, this is no such matter. It is an act established which cannot be ascertained that it has been committed; and what certainty then had Mr. attorney? His opinion! Upon what is it founded? The complaint of the Spanish agent, since there was not a single affidavit.

But, why no affidavit? Because the enemy's captains are not disposed to bring forward, the French privateers are to be subjected to seizure! Such a measure tends to nothing less than to paralyze the seventeenth article of our treaty."

The Secretary of State, in reply, sent to the undersigned minister plenipotentiary the copy of a letter from Mr. Harrison, of 17th September, 1795, in which is this remarkable passage: ""This, however, I have undoubtedly, acted from my own opinion, founded upon such evidence as came to my knowledge; and, as in similar cases, I must necessarily, in the first instance, be unacquainted with the opinions and convictions of others, I know of no other rule by which I can be guided, unless when I am honored with the directions of the chief executive magistrate of this country.""

The Secretary of State thus closes his letter on the 16th of October, covering that of Mr. Harrison:

"You will perceive that, whatever may be the event of the suit pending in court, concerning her [the privateer], and her connection with her commission, is settled, the laws and usages of this country, upon such evidence and information as in the case referred to were produced."

(No. 4.) In virtue of this law, the tribunals were only authorized to decide on cases in which the neutrality of the United States shall have been compromised. Yet these tribunals conceived they had a right to decide upon prizes made by the French, in almost an indifferent manner. In the affair of Glass and Gibas against the ship交易, of which I have already spoken, the tribunal decided whether a prize belonged to enemies or to neutrals. In the affair of Jost Janson against the Dutch ship Vryen Catharina Magdalena, it was decided that the neutralization granted in the territories of France in American citizens, during the war, had given them the right either of serving or of commanding on board of French privateers; that the prizes made by such, although legally commissioned, were not valid; a distinction is established between a legal and an illegal privateer; it was judged that they had a right to pronounce on this legality, and consequently on the validity of the prizes; it was finally decided that a prize made at sea, with the assistance of an illegal privateer, was of no validity, and should not be admitted.

It was according to these first decisions of the Supreme Court that the district attorney of Virginia wrote officially, on the 28th March, 1794, to the vice consul at Norfolk. "No vessel can be condemned as prize but in district courts, which are the proper admiralties of the United States. The enemies of France understood, and did not fail to make use of this convenience; but they and themselves of it; and, in order to cause French privateers to be arrested, they had recourse to the law of 5th June, 1794."

At this period, however, the law had put into the hands of Government a sufficient power for preventing the arming of French vessels. The privateers of the French government, under the presidency of the Supreme, of the 4th of August, 1793, the collectors of the customs were authorized, and even required, to visit, in the strictest manner, not only all privateers, but all vessels entering, or going out of, American ports. The law of 5th June authorized the President to support the exercise of these functions with military force. Of course they did not neglect to visit, with the greatest rigor, all French vessels, privateers, and others, during their continuance in the ports of the United States, and at their departure. They did not quit these ports but under the eye, and with the express permission, of the officers of the Government; for it had forbidden the collectors to clear them, if they committed the least violation on the neutrality of the United States, in which case they might be seized and condemned. Yet after this manner, they had entered the ports of the United States armed, and also went out armed, or had since been armed for war in French ports, scarcely did one of their prizes enter but she was arrested by order of the Federal courts.

The proceedings were instituted and pursued without any of the forms for protecting citizens. As the undersigned minister plenipotentiary has said, the assertion of an enemy of the republic was sufficient for causing a prize to be seized; often the privateer which had brought her in, and sometimes for the arrest of her captain, no proof was required from the enemy consul who instigated the arrest; he was not obliged to give security for the damages which he alleged, nor to give security for the loss and value of the property, or to put up security for the value of his property, on giving security for its value; the prizes were not valued; they simply placed them in the hands of the officers of justice; rarely were they permitted to be sold, and then the sale was made with slowness, and not till the consent of the two parties was obtained. In fine, when, after much delay and expense, notwithstanding the shifts of a crafty chicanery, the complainants proved nothing they advanced, the prizes were adjudged to the captors, but indemnification for damages and losses occasioned by this seizure was refused.

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary knows but two affairs, that of la Nuestra Senora del Carmen, at Rhode Island, and that of le Commerce de Villefranche, at Marseilles, which are to the public explaining, and where damages and interest were allowed to the captors. Yet the tribunals have always allowed damages to the captured when they have declared the prizes illegal. The least pretext was sufficient to obtain from a tribunals of prize in spite of the provision of the law to the contrary. If one or two cannons, one or two barrels of powder, opened some port holes in the territory of the United States.

In the affair of the two prizes of the French privateer Le Citoyens de Marseilles, which entered the port of Philadelphia and commissioned, repaired in the same port, and sent under the eyes of the Government, the only thing in question was, that some port holes were pretended to have been opened in the vessel after her arrival at Philadelphia; the court of Charleston was of opinion that the holes had been opened, and condemned the two prizes. The superior courts did not adopt this opinion, and the first sentence was reversed; but after how long a time, how much care, fatigue, pain, and expense?
In the affair of the Princessa des Asturias, at New York, as will be seen hereafter, only two cannon and a score of guns were in question.

They were the property of the French government, by a patent dated 1790, and arrested under: still more frivolous pretenses. The privateer La Parisienne had infringed a revenue law of the United States; she was seized and condemned by the district court. This tribunal, doubtless agreeable to rules prescribed by the law, had restored this vessel to her owners, on making them pay her value.

Under the circuit court, went on a second appeal; one of the parties was sent into Charleston and the other into Savannah. They were both arrested at the instance of the English consuls, under the pretense that the tribunal had acted illegally, by restoring the confiscated privateer; that, notwithstanding this restitution, and the payment of her value to the treasurer, she had not been unconditionally delivered over to them. This unfounded assertion was seriously opposed in the district and circuit courts, and in the Supreme Court of the United States; at the close of the proceedings, which lasted near two years, the prizes were adjudged to the captors, but without allowing them damages.

In like manner, numerous prizes of the French privateers La Mere Michelle, Le Brustus, Le General Laveaux, and Le Vengeur. The captors have gained their causes in three courts, and have not obtained damages.

It was necessary to cite here all the vexatious proceedings commenced against French vessels, the undersigned must say that they would occupy a volume. He contents himself with adding to what he has just said, the affair of the Vengeance and that of the Cassius.

Affair of the Vengeance.

At the beginning of 1794, the predecessor of the undersigned charged the captain of La Dorade, a French galliot, with a particular mission for St. Domingo. He ordered him to go to New York with his galliot, to take some powder which was at Sandy Hook on board the frigate La Semillante, belonging to the republic, and which made part of her equipment, and to carry them to General Laveaux. This vessel had formerly been armed for war; she had been built with port holes; consequently she attracted the particular attention of the Government. Many difficulties were thrown in her way; but finally, after having submitted to all the requisite inspections, she sailed, with a force of officers, with the Spaniards) in her train. She continued her course till she arrived at New York, where she was arrested, on the pretext that the privateer had been armed in the United States; and we saw officers of the Government appear to defend his action.—Mr. Harrison, attorney of the district of New York, and Mr. Troup, clerk of the district, were present, with a view to appertain the decision of the cause.

It was under these auspices that the prize was arrested, and the captain of the privateer saw himself obliged to defend her against the allegation of a pretended armament: but it was not sufficient to have arrested the prize; they must also attack the privateer. This did not fail to happen. Shortly after, Mr. Harrison, without laying aside his office of attorney for the captured, but acting in this instance in the name of the United States, brought against La Vengeance, and required her arrest under the same pretext which had been used for arresting her prize. This information was not founded on any affidavit or material proof. But Mr. Attorney, according to his letter to the Secretary of State, had no need of any; he had seen, in the hands of the Spanish consul, documents sufficient for having the prize condemned.

In fine, not content with these measures, he made the same attempt, some time after, the two other causes being still pending, exhibited a second information against the privateer, and had her arrested anew, for having exported arms in violation of a law of the United States, which was in force when the Vengeance sailed from New York. This information was made on the simple declaration of Mr. Giles, marshal of the court, who, as informer, was to share part of the confiscation. So that all the officers of the district court (except the judge) were interested in the condemnation of the privateer or her prize. It is well to observe that, during the course of the process, the monies arising from the sale of the prize were deposited in the hands of the clerk, (Attorney for the United States,) paying the hands of the informer.

But this did not yield to this evidence.

However, the three causes were tried; but the yellow fever, which took place at New York, spun them out to a considerable length. The judgment of the circuit court was not given till November. In the meantime, an express, which Captain Berard had sent to St. Domingo on the first arrest of his prize, had returned with papers, in the most convincing manner, that the Vengeance (Vengeur) had arrived at Port de Paix without any armament or equipment whatever; and that she had been sold, armed, and equipped, wholly, and commissioned as a privateer, on the territory of the republic. These documents were certificates of the general, the ordonnateur, and of the greater part of the principal officers of St. Domingo; the accounts of armament attested by all the provisions, arms, and ammunition, that was not authentic if it was not true.

The undersigned hastened to communicate these documents to the Secretary of State of the United States, and to request that he would order the attorney of New York district to stay the proceedings he had instituted in the name of the United States, and there was nothing done with them, and Mr. Harrison continued his prosecution.

In fine, the moment came to appeal to the circuit court; and in the circuit court, the privateer was acquittted of the charge of illegally arming, and the prize adjudged to the captor. Mr. Harrison did not appeal as to the privateer; but the cause of the prize was carried to the circuit court, and finally to the supreme court, and these two tribunals confirmed the sentence of the district court.

As to the exportation, the judge was of opinion that the vessel should be condemned for it, and grounded his sentence only on the article of twenty muskets. Some of the attorneys for the privater had considered it as so little of consequence, that they had not conceived it would be brought in question, and had omitted to speak of it in their pleadings.

But the undersigned had reason to apprehend that the counsel of New York was the appellant, and required, in order to be agreeable to a law of Congress, that the vessel should be given up to him, under security, during the appeal; but he could not obtain it; the vessel was sold for less than a tenth part of the cost of her armament; and the money was deposited as an irrevocable conclusion of the case.

The circuit court, as was expected, set aside the sentence which condemned the privateer; but Mr. Harrison, not content with all he had hitherto done, immediately appealed to the supreme court of the United States, which was not more favorable to him, and confirmed the sentence of the circuit court. The Government, notwithstanding the representations of the undersigned minister plenipotentiary, took a decided part in the appeal, and gave charge to Mr. Lee, the attorney general, to argue, which he did with much eloquence, but with the success such a cause merited.

Affair of the Casuists.

In the month of Thermidor, of the 3rd year, (August, 1795) the corvette Le Cassis, belonging to the republic, commanded by Captain Davis, and sent by General Laveaux to the undersigned minister plenipotentiary, on a particular mission requiring her immediate return to St. Domingo, was seized in virtue of an order from the district court of the United States for the State of Pennsylvania, and her captain was arrested at the suit of a merchant of Philadelphia, for a pretended illegal capture made in virtue of his commission, and out of the jurisdiction of the United States.

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary complained of this violation of the treaties and of the law of nations, and demanded an immediate freedom for the vessel and her property and person; and the case was brought to the supreme tribunal with these results:

He conceived himself so much the more grounded in his request, as he knew that a like interposition was not new in the annals of the United States; as he knew that the Executive power of the State of Pennsylvania had interposed in a similar case, and in the same manner, in favor of the State of Virginia; and as this measure, dictated by a professed love of the law and a desire to defend the rights of the tribunals, organs of the law.* But Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States, replied to the undersigned, on the 19th of August, 1795, * as long as the question is in the hands of our courts, the Executive cannot withdraw it from them.

But the undersigned, addressing, on the 1st Fructidor, in the third year, (18th August, 1795) expressed himself in these terms: * ‘I do not know, nor ought I to know, any other than the Government of the United States; I cannot, under any shape, admit the competency of your tribunals in the different circumstances which arise on the execution or interference of the Executive, without the participation of the President. I can only address myself to the Government for reparation of that violation; otherwise it would be to render the agents of the French Government, the French Government itself, amenable to these tribunals; which would be to reverse principles.’ Infirmed that the Cassis and her captain might be liberated on giving security, the undersigned requested, by the same letter, that the Government of the United States would itself furnish this security and knowing that the Supreme Court of the United States, which was then in session, had the power in certain cases of arresting the proceedings of the inferior courts, on their signifying to them a prohibition, he suggested to the secretary to adopt this sure and prompt method to prevent the retroactive proceedings. The undersigned adhered himself to the supreme tribunal, requested the prohibition, and obtained it. The district court was enjoined immediately to stop the proceedings which had been commenced, and to liberate Captain Davis and his vessel.

But at the very instant in which the * marshal was desired to execute the order of the supreme court, he had already arrested the undersigned, upon the charge of an English merchant and naturalized American, stating that this vessel had been formerly armed in the United States; and consequently requested that she should be confiscated, one moiety to himself, the other moiety to his principal. The undersigned was unaware whether the Minister of the United States; he was even assured that some individuals had only attempted to put on board arms and ammunition, and which they were prevented from doing at the time; but he takes upon himself to affirm, that since that vessel has become the property of the French republic, General Laveaux armed and equipped her wholly at St. Domin- go, after her arrival there, she had not a cuation of property which had not been put on board her in the territory of France. This new order was signed by one of the judges of the supreme court, (in quality of circuit judge) who having already ordered the prohibition in the first instance, must have known very well that this vessel was the property of the French republic; and who must also have known that the circuit court was not competent to this proceeding; so new and instant as it was, and as manifestly contrary to the law of nations, their object was to keep from the minister of France the name of regularity to which his mission was entitled. This has taken place. The undersigned, from a spirit of conciliation, made an useless attempt with one of the judges of the circuit court to obtain the liberation of the vessel, on giving security; the reply was, that the judge could do nothing of himself; that the court, when assembled, could alone determine.

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary made new representations to the Secretary of State of the United States upon the foregoing facts. Mr. Pickering, then Secretary of State, in his answer of 1st August,‡ 1795, repeats this phrase of Mr. Randolph: * ‘As long as the question is in the hands of our courts, the Executive cannot withdraw it from them;’ adding thereto this remarkable expression: * ‘and, therefore, is not chargeable with suffering a vessel to be armed in the United States, and then sent out of the country.’ The undersigned minister plenipotentiary, having accompanied against the Casius had been carried to an incompetent tribunal, and in the same letter of 1st August,‡ 1795, the Secretary of State replied on this head to the undersigned, * ‘the counsel who have told you that such is the law, have led you into a misapprehension of the competency of such courts and tribunals.’

The undersigned minister, in these circumstances, saw himself obliged to disarm the vessel; to discharge the crew, which, during these transactions, he had supported, at great expense, and abandoned the Casius to the Government of the United States, protesting against the illegality of her arrest.

The undersigned minister is not without reason to have happened since that time relative to this affa- r; he only knows that, in the month of October last, the circuit court declared itself incompetent, notwithstanding the assertion of the Secretary of State, and quashed all the proceedings. In consequence, the Secretary offered him the Casius as if, having having retained, in the exercise of treaties, a State vessel, after having left her to the Government of the United States were not to answer but for the violation of the treaties, and for the damages the Cassis has sustained.

(No. 5.) The Secretary of State, by his public letter of the 1st November last, in answer to the note of the undersigned minister plenipotentiary, of the 6th of Brumaire last, appears not to have understood either that note or the decree of the executive directory of the 14th November 1794.

This decree does not simply contain the order for seizing English property on board of neutral vessels, and on course of board on American vessels; it orders that the vessels of the republic shall act towards neutrals in the same manner as neutrals shall act towards them.

This decree consequently implies, not only the seizure of enemies’ property on board of American vessels, against the principle, * free ships make free goods;⁄ a principle the American Government abandoned, after having recognized it by according to the declaration of Russia in 1790; not only the seize of articles classed as contraband in the treaty concluded at Madrid, January 25th, 1795, by the treaty of 1778, but also reprimands for all vexations, contrary to the law of nations and to the treaties, which the Americans shall endure on the part of the English, without an efficacious opposition.

The Secretary of State has been pleased to observe, that France and the United States, by a reciprocal treaty, had agreed upon the principle, * free ships make free goods;⁄ and thereby diminished the list of articles seizable as contraband. Upon this basis he built reasoning which he might have spared if he had been pleased to remember the 2d article of the treaty of 1778.

The Secretary of State has also been pleased to reply in part to the note of the undersigned minister plenipotentiary, dated 6th Brumaire, relative to the press exercised on the American sailors, that the Federal Government were not to give an account to any nation of the measures it takes for the protection of its citizens. If such an answer required a reply, the undersigned minister plenipotentiary would request the Secretary of State to observe, that the 17th article of the treaty referred to, was not at all to know the steps taken by the Federal Government, for the protection of its citizens; but the measures pursued by it for preventing its citizens from increasing the maritime forces of the enemies of the French republic, its ally.

It is evident, that, in this case, the Federal Government should give an account, and that the French republic would have a right to regard its silence as a tacit consent to that measure, and a real hostility.

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary can no longer be suspected of having demanded of the Government of the United States the explanations foreign to the relations which exist between that Government and the French republic, and to the Federal Government, in its letter of 7th Vendémiaire in the fourth year, since, after the passage cited by the Secretary of State, is the following paragraph: "But I am convinced it will not be

"It is in this conviction that I have written you this letter, persuaded that it is perhaps superfluous to address you these explanations. I do not doubt but the American Government will prove all Europe the intention it has announced to maintain in regard to the belligerent Powers that it will oblige England to violate no longer the rights of nations, and that it will not henceforward reduce France to the pain of addressing new claims upon this subject."

(NO. 6.) In the General Advertiser, published at Philadelphia, on the 9th of June, 1794, may be seen the questions proposed by the President on the 16th of April, 1793, to the Heads of the Departments. The undersigned minister plenipotentiary has the honor to add the following extract:

Question 2. Shall a minister from the republic of France be received?

Question 3. If received, shall it be absolutely or with qualifications? and, if with qualifications, of what kind?

Question 4. Are the United States obliged, by good faith, to conspire with their predecessor, as applying to the present situation of the parties: may they either renounce them, or hold them suspended till the Government of France shall be established?

Question 12. Should the future regent of France send a minister to the United States, ought he to be received?

(No. 7.) The French Government, jealous of giving to the United States proofs of its attachment, had communicated negotiations with the regency of Algiers, in order to put an end to the war which that Power was making on the commerce of the United States. The Minister for Foreign Affairs, by a letter of the 5th of January, 1794, instructed the predeces sor of the undersigned to communicate to the Federal Government the steps which the regency of Algiers were taking to prevent the commerce of the United States, and, at the same time, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, on the 16th Frimaire in the second year, the following letter: "I have already had the pleasure, sir, to inform you, verbally, of the interests which the committee of public safety of the National Convention had, in due season, taken in the truly unhappy situation of your commerce in the Mediterranean.

The subsequent conference, by calling for it, and recalling the steps which are to be taken by our agent with the Day of Algiers, for repressing this new manœuvre of the British administration, which has put the finishing stroke to its proofs of malevolence towards free people. The despatch of the above mentioned letter was communicated the 1st of January, and did not come to my hands till fifteen days ago. I do not yet know by what route. I could have wished it had been less precipitate, that I might sooner have fulfilled the agreeable task of proving to you, by facts, the protestations of friendship, which I have so often spoken in the name of the republic of France.

The situation of the American commerce, and my responsibilities, have caused me some concern for the success of those negotiations which were to have been opened in January last. If the situation of your affairs is yet such, with respect to that barbarous regency, as that our intervention may be of some utility, I pray you to invite the President to cause to be communicated to me the means that he will join to those of the committee of public safety, for the purpose of effecting a renewal of the amicable relations of the two nations. This, sir, is the object of my present communication on this subject. I shall be satisfied to be able to transmit it by a very early conveyance, which I am now preparing for France."

The Secretary of State replied to him on the 6th of June, 1794, by a letter, of which the following is an extract:

"Your other letter, of the 4th of June, is a powerful demonstration of the interest which the republic of France takes in the fate of the United States. I have added only our measures, and our one wish is to see the effects of the negotiations which your Government has pursued in our behalf, but, as you will so soon receive the detail of those measures, which your Government have pursued in our behalf, and after the rising of Congress some new arrangement will probably be adopted by the Executive, it will be better, perhaps, to postpone our comment on this matter until the intelligence, which you further expect, shall arrive."

Then Mr. Jay was charged to negotiate with the British Government, and the citizen Fauchet did not afterwards receive any communication on the subject.

(NO. 8.) On the 13th Floréal, in the third year of the republic, (3d of May, 1794) the predecessor of the undersigned minister plenipotentiary expressed himself in these terms to the Secretary of State, upon the blockade of the French colonies:

"After so many useless attempts, sir, you must be sensible of the pain I experience in tracing this picture, so different from that which the French republic gives whenever justice towards you is in question, even though her interests are the same in fact, and that there was necessarily an equal interest to obtain from them, but in this instance she demands but justice, and cannot obtain it. On the contrary, she sees her enemies admitted to an intimacy with you, at the moment in which your commerce and your sovereignty are alike insulted by them; at the moment when, adding decision to injustice, they despoil you upon the seas, when they promise to indemnify you for former acts."

"This is reflection that we must wait under your eye the official legalization of a proclamation, which prohibits your commerce with our colonies, and suspends to you alone the law of nations. I know, sir, what respect imposes on me as to what influences, will be the effect of your punishment, and that you will be convinced that the latter will not exist, when on the one hand, you can no longer maintain your treaties, and, on the other, you are obliged to abandon commerce exclusively to the nation whose colonies will soon declare all the universe blockaded, except her possessions. What account do you conceive I can render to the French Government of the means you take for rendering your neutrality respectable? Yet, on that, my information is so meagre, and it is on that, more especially, that France is uneasy.

The Secretary of State replied, on the 29th of May, 1795, to this passage of citizen Fauchet's letter, in the following manner:

"The predicament of a neutral nation is always peculiar and delicate, and eminently so while it defends itself against charges of partiality from one of the warring Powers, lest it should seem to palliate the misdoings of ano- ther. But I refer this subject to the Executive, that the validity of the proclamation of blockade is asserted to. We did read, on the 10th of April, 1795, a publication from His Britannic Majesty's con- cerning the General and Southern States of America, giving public notice that he had received official communications that the islands of Guadeloupe, Martinique, and Desirade, were, by proclamation, issued by His Britannic Majesty's authority, in the West Indies, blockaded; and that neutral vessels were, by that proclamation, prohibited from attempting to enter any of the ports or places of the said islands with provisions or supplies of any nature or kind whatsoever, under the penalty of be- ing taken and condemned. The said proclamation was enclosed to the established laws of nations. 9 So highly valuable has the West India commerce always been, that this exception was often revived in the interest of the military investment of a place? Surely not the besieged, but the besiegers, whether we consult principle or practice. The check which

n early, indeed, have remonstrated, last with what color may well be imagined, when this Department was unprovided with any document upon which the rescinding of that edict could have been urged. If rumor were a fit guide, who can pronounce on which side rumor preponderated, when stripped of the exaggerations which a host of passions had gathered together? We had, it may be said, one effort remaining, which was to promulge to the citizens of the United States that the proclamation was null and void as to them. If, after this defiance of that act, any American vessel had risked, and incurred confiscation, the Government would have been imported for something more than the general protection, which is the birthright of all our citizens. The clamor would have been much louder, the fire and brimstone in the newspapers would have been more assiduous.

(No. 9.) The citizen Genet, one of the predecessors of the undersigned, notified the Secretary of State, on the 23d of May, 1793, that he was empowered to renew the existing treaties between the French republic and the United States. The Secretary of State replied to him that the Senate not being assembled, it was impossible to meet his overtures, because that body were, according to the constitution, to participate in the consummation of treaties.

On the 30th of September, 1793, citizen Genet renewed the subjects the Secretary of State, in acknowledging the receipt of that letter, informed him that he had laid it before the President, and that it will be taken into consideration with all the respect and interest that such an object requires.

The Senate assembled, and the treaty was never again brought in question.

The predecessor of the undersigned, in his verbal communications with the Secretary of State, expressed the desire which he made had of renewing her treaties. He, the undersigned minister plenipotentiary, charged to prepare, with the Federal Government, the plan of a new treaty of commerce, communicated to the Secretary of State, on the 30th June, 1795, (O. S.) that part of his instructions which authorized him to open this negotiation.

On this subject the President gave the necessary authority to the Secretary of State, who explained to the undersigned the manner in which they could proceed in it. But at what time? When the ratification of the treaty concluded between Lord Grenville and Mr. Jay no longer permitted the undersigned to pursue that negotiation.

Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, 9th Froidorian, (August 26, 1794, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: I have informed you, several times, of the numberless vexations which our privateers are made to experience at the instigation of English agents; this persecution, far from diminishing, becomes intolerable. I have used all the means in my power to prevent armaments in the United States no commission has been granted since my arrival, and you may be assured that none will be given hereafter, with the earnest wish of keeping out of the United States, the most odious proceeding. I wait for certain information that I may submit them to the justice and impartiality of the Government, which I believe is tenacious in the execution of its treaties, and in dissolving all those miserable substanations—those miserable chicaneries, shamefully employed to damp the courage of the mariners of the French republic. In the mean time, sir, I send you a picture which, without doubt, will be as affecting to you as it is to myself. I pray you to cause orders to be given to the officers of the customs at Newport, to restore to the agent of the republic, the prize made by the privateer Sans Pareil. Without informing the consuls, without adhering more to the laws of equity than to those of our treaty, this prize has been captured, and that the privateer Sans Pareil had been armed in the ports of the United States. If this pretext had been really alleged, a more glaring injustice and more palpable falsehood could not have been disguised; but, perhaps, (as I may be permitted to suppose, after such conduct) they have only wished to gain time; but, perhaps, as has frequently happened, they have only wished to discourage and fatigue the captors, by inducing the prize, from the length of time required for obtaining the decision, which they will retard by a thousand unfair expedients. In this case, sir, it is at length time to take a determination which will secure the interests of the captors, who, without this precaution, will be always injured, whatever may be the determination of the courts; they will be affected, first by the loss of the prize, and secondly, by the expenses in procuring this foreign privateer, and vessels which they shall have taken. This reflection, dictated by justice, reminds me that a letter I wrote to you, requesting indemnity for the ship William, which has been suffered to decay in the port of Philadelphia upwards of a year, for the want of a decision, remains without an answer. I am inclined to believe, notwithstanding your silence, that you have taken my request into consideration; I will go farther, and say that I am sure it has been as favorably received as it is just. The one I now make is not less so, sir, and I calculate upon an answer as prompt as favorable.

Accept, sir, my esteem.

Sir: It being represented that the Perseverance, a prize to the French privateer Sans Pareil, is detained at Newport by your excellency's order, with a view to institute an inquiry into the legality of the privateer, and, consequently, of the prize, I have to request you, sir, as soon as may be, to transmit to me the circumstances of the case. I have now before me a letter from the French minister, who expresses great anxiety lest delay should take place in the settlement of cases like the present, and the arduous of French privateers be damped by the vexations which a seizure of their prizes may produce.

No. 13.

Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, 30th Vendémiaire, (17th October, 1794, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: I conceive how painful it must be to you to observe me recurring so often to the same questions, and speaking to you so frequently on the same affairs; be persuaded that it is not less so to me, to have daily new motives of complaint against the abuse made of the laws, in order to persecute our privateers.

You announce to me that La Perseverance, prize to the Sans Pareil, had been delivered to the captors by order of the Governor of Rhode Island; in contempt of that decision the English agents have just created new difficulties; a new decision is still expected to take place on the first Monday of November. It is impossible, sir, for this state of things to continue much longer. You are sensible how necessary it will be to retract from our treaty the article which improperly permits the ships of war of the two nations to conduct to, and sell their prizes in, their respective ports; should this right become illusory and void by the difficulty throned in the way of its execution. I proposed a method as simple as it is just, for putting an end to this tyranical chicanery: this method was, to require security from those who have professed prizes as illegal. Were this measure adopted, it would render our enemies less ingenious in their proceedings, and prevent them from bringing so many actions of the injustice of which they themselves are convinced.

Your silence led me to presume that you were of opinion with me on this point. I am undeceived by the recent complaints which crowd upon me from all parts; I expect, sir, that the Federal Government will put an end to these persecutions of the privateer I have proposed, or by any other which your wisdom may suggest.

Permit me, sir, to call to your attention, at the same time, the outrage committed on board the Favorite by men clad in American uniform. Among the arms which they have pillaged, there are some of which the republic stand in great need. I hope that these will not add to the crime already committed, delays injurious to the interests of the French republic, outraged by an act so contrary to the law of nations and to treaties.

Accept, sir, my esteem.

No. 14.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

PHILADELPHIA, October 22, 1794.

Sir: I received your letter of the 17th inst, remonstrating against the vexations which your cruisers are said to experience, with the most unqualified wishes that we were always able to administer immediate relief. But the extent of the United States imposes the necessity of substituting the agency of the Governors in the place of an instantaneous action in the Federal Executive, and therefore general rules alone can be provided.

Under these rules, formed in the last year, the Governor of Rhode Island operated on the prize of the Sans Pa-rel, and discharged her. If, however, individuals conceive that they have a legal claim upon her, and draw her before a court of law, the Executive of the United States cannot forbid them. The plea, under the treaty, that the court has no cognizance of French prizes, will be admitted if it applies, and the person by whom the process is instituted will be liable to a judgment for costs and damages, if he fails in his proof.

The bond, which you propose as a security against vexation, we have no power to demand, because the Executive do not mean to interfere, without presumptive proof of title; and this presumption, when established, would seem to be a sufficient protection against being harassed. The courts have their forms, founded on similar precautions. Knowing that this was the situation of our laws, I am not authorized to make the arrangement proposed.

However, I will do every thing which can be done with propriety; and that is contained in the letter of which I have the honor of sending you a copy.

Papers respecting the Favorite were received this morning from New York, and copies of them are now transnimed to you.

I have the honor, &c.

CIRCULAR.

The Secretary of State to the Governors of the several States.

PHILADELPHIA, October 22, 1794.

Sir: It gives me pain to inform you the excellency that Mr. Fauchet, the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic, believes that he has reason to complain of the treatment which French prizes have too often received in our ports.

He represents that, by the machinations of the enemies of his country, the captors are harassed by seizures, arrests, and detentions, the most vexatious and cruel: that as soon as the claimants are failed in one attempt, they betake themselves to another, when, under the pretense of the confidence which the President reposes in the executives of the States, they have been requested to fulfill the general rules laid down by him, I could only undertake to address your excellency upon the subject.

It is in his anxiety that a bond should be given by the claimants before the executives shall interpose in any case of a prize. Doubting the legality and expediency of this suggestion, I have it not in my power to recommend it.

But I have assured him that none of the chief magistrates of the States will ever interfere, without a strong presumption of title. A late circumstance has, however, brought to view the practicability of oppression, unless precautions be adopted by the executives. The claimants may often pursue a double course, by first procuring a trial before the Governors, and, if defeated, by next resorting to the courts of law. It is desirable, therefore, that whensover an application shall be made to your excellency, with respect to a prize, you should cause it to be examined well, whether the courts have jurisdiction to inquire into the affair. If they have, then it seems proper that your excellency should not interpose. If the courts have not jurisdiction, and you are convinced that there is good ground for detaining the prize, in order to comply with the rules established by the President last year, then, and then only, your excellency will so proceed. By these means, the vexation complained of will be avoided, as far as lies in your power, the executive is not to be indulgent, and certainly the executive ought not to yield to the judiciary, who are more particularly the expositors of it. By these means, also, the article of that treaty will be best preserved from violation, and the honor of our nation sustained.

But nothing which I have now taken the liberty of offering to your excellency's consideration is intended to change the success which, at any time, you may find it necessary to give to the officers charged with the execution of legal process.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The said Supreme Court of the United States being met, and the advocates aforesaid attending, the court proceeded to the publication of their final sentence or decree, which, being read and filed, is in the words following, to wit:

This court being decidedly of opinion that every district court in the United States possesses all the powers of a court of admiralty, whether considered as an instance or as a prize court, and that the plea of the aforesaid appellee, Pierre Arcade Johannene, to the jurisdiction of the district court of Maryland, is insufficient; therefore, it is considered by the Supreme Court aforesaid, and now finally decreed and adjudged, by the same, that the said plea be, and the same is hereby, overruled and dismissed, and that the decree of the said district court of Maryland, founded thereon be, and the same is hereby, revoked, reversed, and annulled.

And the said supreme court being further at liberty to decide, in the present cause, whether the court of the United States, is, or is not, by law and right, the court to which the said claimants shall have recourse for the redress of their grievances, it is hereby ordered and adjudged, that this said district court of Maryland has jurisdiction, and is entitled to decide, whether, in the present case, restitution ought to be made to the claimants, or to the vessel of same, and in all matters relating to the expenses incurred by the said claimants, in their proceedings in the said case.

And the said Supreme Court being further of opinion that no foreign Power can, of right, institute or erect any court of judicature, of any kind, within the jurisdiction of the United States, but such only as may be warranted by, and be in pursuance of, treaties it is, therefore, decreed and adjudged, that the admiralty jurisdiction, which has been exercised in the United States by the consuls of France, not being warranted, is not of right.

It is further ordered by the said Supreme Court, that this cause be, and it hereby is, remanded to the district court for the Maryland district, for a final decision, and that the several parties to the same do each pay their own costs.

Joseph Fouchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 27th Fructidor, 2d year of the French republic, one and indivisible, (13th Sept. 1794.)

Sir:

I am about to lay before you an affair, which I have often mentioned to you in conversation. I could have wished that it was possible to present you, at the same time, an account of the vexations of which I complained in my letter of the 9th Fructidor,* and of which Charleston has been the principal scene. It is painful to me to be obliged to recur to subjects of such nature; but I could delay no longer to communicate to you the affair which shall constitute the subject of this letter, and on which I think it my duty to claim the speedy justice and good offices of the Federal Government.

The French privateer L'Ami de la Pointe à Petre, Captain William Talbot, commissioned at Guadaloupe, sailed near the island of Cuba, a Dutch brigantine called Vrouw Christiane Magne. This vessel had been originally captured by a French armed vessel, called L'Amour de la Liberté, but having been met with, and visited by L'Ami de la Pointe à Petre, and the prize master, who had been put on board by the first captor, not being able to produce a commission, the latter manned her and brought her to Charleston. Having arrived at that port, Capt. Talbot, von not respecting the rights of the Dutch captain, and as a security, to the amount of fourteen thousand dollars, was demanded from him for his liberty. Proceedings were immediately instituted against the captors in the court of admiralty, and, notwithstanding the representations of the French consul, notwithstanding the documents furnished in favor of Talbot, and with every pretext you will soon see, were not of a nature to be refused, the prize was adjudged illegal, and restored to the claimants.

I could have wished, sir, to have it in my power to send you a formal copy of the decree pronounced by the court; but if the enclosed extract from the Gazette of Charleston may be deemed sufficient information, it appears that the sentence was grounded on the illegality of the act of the capturing vessels, on Captain Talbot being a citizen of the United States, and his vessel armed at Charleston.

On the first point I will observe, that L'Ami de la Pointe à Petre should have been considered as the only legitimate captor, the schooner L'Amour de la Liberté not having any right, and her existence as a vessel armed for a cruise being absolutely out of my knowledge that it was by address that the claimants instituted an action, on the ground of the illegality of this first captor; that intrigue suppressed the just representations which Talbot might have substantiated, and confounded him with the other. I will add, sir, that, as soon as I was informed of the manner in which L'Amour de la Liberté had been armed and commissioned, I sent pressing orders to Charleston to do justice on the occasion, deeming, thereby, to give your Government a new proof of the fidelity with which we keep our promises.

* August 26, 1794.
To illustrate the second point, I enclose, sir, a copy of the oath which citizen Talbot took to the French republic, before the municipality of Pointe à Pétre, an oath which assures him the rights of a French citizen, which, agreeably to the laws of your country, he had a right to take, and in virtue of which I find myself obliged to maintain him in his demand. I sincerely wish your friends at the same time, a copy of the commission which he obtained from citizen Collot, then Governor of Guadaloupe. You will hereby see that the vessel which he commands is French property, belonging to citizen Samuel Riddick, of Pointe à Pétre. These documents, sir, which were officially communicated to me by the consul of Charleston, are the same which were produced in support of Talbot's claim. I have reason to be very much surprised that their validity should appear to have been drawn in question by the judge of the court of admiralty. Acts passed by a French municipality, or delivered by French public officers, acknowledged as such, ought not to have been submitted to the control of the American courts, and it, without doubt, in consequence of a mistake, of an inaccuracy in the said account, that the affair presents such an aspect. The point to be decided appears to me, whether Talbot had, or had not, a right to become a Frenchman, on renouncing the protection of the United States. Whether his vessel had, or had not, been built in the United States, appears to me to be immaterial, since it is proved that the vessel was French property when she was commissioned. Besides, I do not believe that in last December there existed a law to prohibit an American from transporting his property, at his own risk, and disposing of it where, and to whom, he should think proper.

To return, sir, I have just explained to you the vexatious to which citizen Talbot has been exposed, as well in his person as his property. I earnestly request you, and I expect it from the justice of the Federal Government, to cause them to cease as soon as possible. As far as the process commenced against him is concerned, I believe that he has appealed, in his own name, to the circuit court, from the sentence pronounced by the admiralty. I know that the Government cannot officially interfere in this business; but would it not be possible to engage the attention of the district at Charleston to aid Captain Talbot with his good offices to recover, as speedily as possible, a prize which, according to the seventeenth article of our treaty, the "Ami de la Pointe à Pétre, acknowledged to be a French privateer, " has a right to conduct where it pleases, without the officers of the admiralty in the ports or harbours of the United States taking cognizance of the validity of the said prize? I cannot close this letter without mentioning to you a circumstance which took place in the suit in question, and which lies heavy at my heart. The chancellor of the consulate at Charleston was summoned to the bar of the court, to address the court of admiralty, in my proclamation; he appeared there with and without the document demanded, or the documents themselves. I enclose a copy of the summons. Without speaking of the immunities of our chancellors, and of the application of this right to the present case, you will observe, sir, inconsistent as the terms of this paper are with the cordiality which ought to prevail between the two countries, I have the right to expect. I acknowledge that this incident very seriously affects me: for this kind of procedure, even supposing it to be justified in the law cannot fail finally to interrupt the good understanding which so happily prevails between the two people, especially if it be compared with the attentive and very delicate manner with which the American tribunals have hitherto treated the causes of the French nation on similar occasions. I do not doubt, sir, that you will partake of my sensibility in this respect.

Accept, &c. J. H. FAUCHET.

CHARLESTON, Saturday, August 9, 1794.

Wednesday, in the court of admiralty for this district, the judge pronounced his decree in the long contested cause of the Dutch brigantine the Vrouw Christiana Magdalena, captured and brought into this port by the captains Ballard and Talbot.

The libel was on behalf of the captain and owners of the said brigantine, claiming restitution under the 15th and 19th articles of the treaty with the United Netherlands. A plea was entered to the jurisdiction of the court, under the 17th article of the treaty with France, and the 6th section of the act of Congress of the 5th of June last, entitled "An additional act to the punishment of crimes and offences against the United States."

The defendant, William Talbot, as a French citizen, acting under a commission from the Governor of Guadaloupe, and as having taken this vessel out of the possession of Captain Ballard, the original captor, his prize-producer having no commission.

The judge, in considering the arguments in support of the plea to the jurisdiction, over-ruled the same as irrelevant—

1st. Because the 17th article of the treaty with France contemplates only French vessels of war, or privates legally appointed.

2d. Because the 6th section of the act of Congress of the 5th of June last, does not lessen the jurisdiction of the district courts in any case of which they had previously cognizance; and the decree of the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Glass and others, against the sleep Betsey, &c. having declared that every district court of the United States possesses all the power of an admiralty court, whether considered as an instance or a prize even accepted, this cause was therefore cognizable therein by the law of nations, and the constitution of the court.

The judge being of opinion that Captain Ballard had acted without any commission authorizing him to cruise or arm for war, and had not even the pretence of being a French citizen; that Captain Talbot having armed his vessel (then an American bottom) in an American port, proceeded thence to Guadaloupe, for the express purpose, as appeared in evidence, of changing the property, applying for a French commission, obtaining the same within two days after the sale of the vessel, and under color of such commission, having captured the said brigantine Vrouw Christiana Magdalena; which acts were deemed contrary to the 19th article of the treaty with the United Netherlands, in the absence of any commission from the French republic in Charleston, heretofore issued in the city of Charleston, in South Carolina district, to the schooner Citizen Genet, the schooner

FRENCH REPUBLIC. — In the name of the French people.

George Henry Victor Collot, major general of the armies of the French republic, Governor of the islands and their dependencies.

In consequence of the declaration of war made against the King of England and the Stadtholder of Holland, agreeably to the proclamation of citizen Rochambeau, commandant general of the Windward Islands, and the hostilities committed in the latitudes of Guadeloupe, and its dependencies, by the ships of the enemy:

We, in virtue of the powers delegated to us, authorize citizen Samuel Riddick, resident at Pointe à Pétre, to arm for war, under the command of citizen William Talbot, the schooner l’Ami de la Pointe à Pétre, of the burthen of about sixty tons, to cruise against the enemies of the republic, of whatsoever nation they may be, and to sustain, with the courage and intrepidity of a true republican, the dignity and honor of the national flag.

We enjoin the owner and officers commanding the said schooner, not to permit any pillage of negroes, cattle, moveables, and utensils, of the inhabitants residing upon those enemy coastis religiously to respect the fishermen, their canoes and nets, conformably to the decree of the National Convention, hereby disavowing all violations which may be exercised against the law of nations; and we formally declare that we will compel the restitution of all captures which shall be made contrary to the law of a liberal and generous warfare, which the French republic intends to wage with its enemies.

We equally desire that the prizes which may be made may be conducted, as far as it is practicable, into the ports of Guadeloupe and, if this colony should be attacked, that the said vessel should come to its assistance and make a common cause with it, against the public enemies; and for the fulfillment of the above conditions, citizen Samuel Riddick has given good and sufficient security to the municipality of Pointe à Pétre; and the present shall be enrolled in the tribunal of the district of the said town of Pointe à Pétre.

Given at Basse Terre, Guadeloupe, the 5th of January, 1794, in the third year of the French republic.

Joseph Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 8th Bramaire, (23rd October, 1794, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: — I take the liberty of reminding you of the letter which I had the honor to write to you on the 12th of last month (O. S.) on the subject of citizen Talbot. I have nothing to add to the facts which it contains, unless that it is much to be feared lest the circuit court, before whom the appeal was brought, may pass over, as superficially as the district court, the unquestionable documents which Talbot exhibits, and lest the matter may become otherwise very complicated, if with this unfavorable issue, the chance of which was foreseen, it should proceed without the interposition of the Government.

Your silence, sir, I must confess, excites my solicitude for the idea you may have formed of the consequences of this decision. They go far beyond the simple fact of prize; and fearing lest they may have escaped you, I must beg you to put me to represent them here in a summary form.

The decision already made, and that which is foreseen, implicate at once the treaties, the law of nations, and the fundamental maxims of municipal law.

The validity of a prize is contested notwithstanding the legal commission of the captor; notwithstanding the 17th article of our treaty,—an article solemnly guaranteed by the 29th of the treaty of Holland with you, of which I am astonished that Talbot’s antagonists should be permitted to avail themselves.

The right, which every citizen of a free State possesses, of entering into the service of a foreign nation, and of procuring himself to be naturalized there, is drawn in question; the word prize has received a definition of a terrible extent. If the decision of the first tribunal is founded in justice, your citizens are villains attached to the soil, your laws follow them to a foreign domain, even though they have renounced them. France, although she has naturalized...
Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

PHILADELPHIA, October 28, 1794.

Sir:

Two reasons have prevented an earlier answer to your letter of the 13th ultimo, which was received on the 16th. The first was, that the insurrection at Pittsburg, and the subjects connected with it, necessarily absorbed our attention; and the second, that I was in hopes that a complete copy of the record, duly exemplified, would have been forwarded to you. We should then have been more fully qualified to examine this case, throughout its several stages. For, although what shall come from you will always be treated with the most respectful attention, yet, when the conduct of one of our courts is impeached, there may often be, in a formal statement of its proceedings, at full length, something which may vary the impression arising from a detached part of them. However, as in your letter of yesterday you urge an answer, I now do myself the honor of transmitting it.

1. The necessity of a complete record is demonstrated by your first remark, that the Ami de la Pointe & Poirot ought to be considered as the sole lawful captor. This is entirely a matter of fact, and must have depended upon the evidence given.

After this fact was established so as to satisfy the judge, it would seem that he then inquired whether she was a legal privateer. Whether the equipment of the vessel here was with a view to convert her into a privateer at Guadaloupe, it is impossible for us to judge, deprived of the testimony; or whether, if this was the case, she thereby became illicit, is a point of law which, at this stage of the business, the Executive cannot take up. For the principle will be admitted, that the Government to which an individual belongs cannot interpose, in his behalf, for a defect of justice, until the gradation of tribunals shall have been resorted to and in this channel Captain Talbot seems to be now proceeding.

2. I cannot doubt that Captain Talbot has taken an oath to the French republic; and, at the same time, I acknowledge my belief that no law of any of the States prohibits a privateer. It is obvious, that to prevent frauds, some rules and ceremonies are necessary for its government. It then becomes a question, which is also an affair of the judiciary, whether these rules and ceremonies have been complied with. Should he prove to be a French citizen, he ought and will be acquitted. Should he prove to be an American citizen, he will be amenable to the laws.

Under these circumstances, you will perceive that it is impracticable for the Executive of the United States to interpose, as yet, at least, so far as regards the foregoing case. For, to interpose would imply that the Executive is satisfied of his being in a situation which enables him to decide on the affair; which is not the case.

I am, sir, your obedient servant.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

April 16, 1794.

The communications which I have made to you during your present session, from the despatches of our minister in London, contain a serious aspect of our affairs with Great Britain. But, as peace ought to be pursued with unremitted zeal, before the last resource—which has so often been the scourge of nations, and cannot fail to check the advanced prosperity of the United States—is contemplated, I have thought proper to nominate, and do hereby nominate John Jay, as envoy extraordinary of the United States to His Britannic Majesty. My confidence in our minister plenipotentiary in London continues undiminished; but a mission like this, while it corresponds with the solemnity of the occasion, will announce to the world a sollicitude for a friendly adjustment of our complaints, and a reluctance to hostility. Going immediately from the United States, such an envoy will carry with him a full knowledge of the existing temper and sensibility of our country; and will thus be taught to vindicate our rights with firmness, and to cultivate peace with sincerity.

G. WASHINGTON.

No. 25.

Declaration of Edmund Randolph.

JULY 8, 1795.

I never could, with truth, have informed the French minister that the mission, as set forth in the President's message to the Senate, contemplated only an adjustment of our complaints, if by this phrase it be intended to exclude commercial arrangements; I could have had no reason for saying so, since the French republic could have had nothing to do with our commercial arrangements, if they did not derogate from her rights—it could have answered no purpose, when so short a time would develop the contrary—I never did inform the French minister as is above stated.

The only official conversation which I recollect with Mr. Fauchet, upon this subject, was when I communicated to him, with the President's permission, that Mr. Jay was instructed not to weaken our engagements to France. Neither then, nor at any other time, in official or unofficial conversation, did I ever say to him that nothing of a commercial nature was contemplated; or that nothing but the controversies under the old treaty, and the spoliations, were contemplated.

Mr. Fauchet, some time ago, said to me, that he understood, from what I said, that Mr. Jay was not authorized to treat of commercial matters. I told him that he misunderstood me. No letter has ever passed upon this subject.

EDM. RANDOLPH.
The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 12th Messori, (June 30, 1795, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:

I have received the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded between the United States and Great Britain, of which the President has been pleased that I should be possessed, in order to enable me to make such observations thereon as I might judge proper. This frank measure is to me a sure guarantee of the friendship of the contracting nations towards each other, and of a view for the common good, and of a spirit of mutual confidence. I am, therefore, with confidence that I am about to submit the reflections to which the reading of the treaty his given birth. They will not be founded, sir, upon general questions; they shall be confined merely to the specific stipulations of the treaty, and, which, contrary to the interests of France, appear to me to destroy the effect of her treaty with the United States.

I shall not speak of the 19th article, since that is suspended. I shall not represent to you how injurious it may be to France and the United States. It necessarily paralyzes the commerce of the United States with the French colonies, and is calculated to diminish the maritime power of these colonies, to which it will be well known that France has not a sufficient navy, on which we cannot count, to defend even the coast of the United States, against which he cannot vend in Europe? Is not this an indirect means of preventing the colonies from participating in advantages which the English reserve to themselves? But, sir, this is not the only article upon which I can present observations.

The 17th, 18th, 24th, and 25th articles appear to merit great attention, when we compare them with the 29th, 34th, and 17th of our treaty. Indeed, sir, subsequent to the 17th, which states that the contracting parties agree that the respective vessels may be arrested and detained upon just suspicion that they are laden with merchandises belonging to an enemy, or that they are carrying the enemy's contraband of war, &c. is the 19th article describing those articles, and which states: "It is agreed that, under the said denomination, shall be comprised all arms and implements serving for the purposes of war, by land or sea, such as cannon, muskets, mortars, petards, bombas, grenades, carcasses, saucisses, carriages for cannon, musket rests, bandoliers, gunpowder, match, saltpetre, balls, pikes, poulterers, powder, lanse, halberds, mortars, petards, grenades, saltpetre, muskets, musket ball, bucklers, helmets, breast plates, coats of mail, and the like kinds of arms, proper for arming soldiers, musket rests, belts, horses with their furniture, and all other warlike instruments whatever. These merchandises which follow shall be considered as belonging to the enemy, and not as contraband of war: all manufactures of firearms, the arms of war, instruments of war, furniture, ammunition, &c. shall not be considered as mere contraband of war; no more than contraband of war shall be considered as mere manufactures of war goods; for that they may be transported and carried in the freest manner by the subjects of both confederacies, even to places belonging to an enemy, such towns or places being only excepted, as are at that time besieged, blockaded, or invested."

The law of the 13th Nivose, in the 3d year, secures to the treaties a full execution, and the arrêt of the committee of public safety, dated the 27th of the same month, transmitted to you by Colonel Monroe, bears evidence of the entire execution of the article of our treaty which I have just cited to you. The United States, therefore, in virtue of that article, may transport what they may, hemp, flax, flax, tar, pitch, ropes, cables, sails, sail clothes, anchors and any parts of anchors, also ships' masts, planks, beams, and beams, and of what trees never, and all other things proper either for building or repairing ships, and all other goods whatever, which have been not worked into any instrument or thing prepared for war, by land or by sea, shall not be reputed contraband, much less such as have been already wrought and made up for any other use; all which shall be wholly reckoned among free goods, as likewise all other merchandises of whatever kind, that are either no contraband or not contraband, nor have been or can be considered as such, and shall be carried by all the ships of the United States to any ports of France, to be sent thither by land or sea, or to be removed to other places, by land or sea, for the benefit of the United States, without any duty for bringing in, in particular care shall be taken to hasten their departure, and to cause them to retire as soon as possible. Nothing in this treaty contained shall, however, be construed or operate contrary to former and existing public treaties with other nations; but this article only provides that the United States shall agree, that, while they continue in the amity, and the future make any treaty that shall be inconsistent with the present article."

While the 17th article of our treaty states that French ships of war, and those which France shall have armed for war, as also the vessels of the United States, or of their inhabitants, may conduct their prizes into the respective ports of the two nations; that neither asylum nor refuge shall be given, in their ports or havens to those who shall have made prize on the respective inhabitants of the two countries, and, if they are forced to enter, by tempests or the dangers of the sea, they shall be to come out as soon as possible. If we compare this article with those of the treaty made with Great Britain, it will be easily seen that, during the present war, it is destroyed by the first. For, although the 25th article of the treaty with Great Britain states: "Nothing in this treaty contained shall, however, be construed or operate contrary to former and existing public treaties with other sovereigns, and States," we ought to infer therefrom that France, through the treaty it made, gave the 25th article of the treaty allows her, yet it is very clear that the English will have the right of claiming the execution of the 23d and 24th articles of their treaty with the United States; that they will have, during the present war, the privilege of conducting their prizes into the ports of the United States. This contrary to the stipulations of the 17th article, to which they were not parties, and it is possible that they would be refused to her in virtue of that article.

Such, sir, are the observations which I have thought it my duty to present. I shall wait for your answer, in order to transmit the treaty to the committee of public safety of the National Convention. It has never doubted the justice which accords to the American rights of France, and I am convinced that the present circumstances will furnish a new proof of their good intentions.

Accept, sir, the assurance, &c.

P. A. ABET.

No. 97.

The Secretary of State to Mr. ADEL, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 6, 1795.

SIR:—I accept, as a pledge of that harmony which you are anxious to cultivate between our two nations, your letter of the 30th ult., received on the 1st instant, at night. Let it be our unvaried practice to suffer no suspicion to ripen into an unfriendly sentiment, until it shall have been imparted to each other; and let us repel with firmness the artifice by which ill affected persons, under the guise of attachment to the French republic, endeavor to embroil it with the United States.

When you expressed to me, on Monday last, some uneasiness which the report of the contents of the proposed treaty with Great Britain excited in your breast, I more readily informed you of my intention to ask the President's permission to furnish you with a copy, as I was convinced that an entire view of it would not entirely remove your apprehensions, but would also prevent any misrepresentation or misrepresentation which might occur. Having delivered to you a copy, I am now to examine the provisions which seem to you irreconcilable with our engagements to France.

Upon our looking into the President of the United States, and is now repeated, that those engagements shall not, with his consent, be infringed. As far, therefore, as he is concerned, you need only prove, at any time, that a given measure will infringe it, and he will not countenance that measure. The same, I am persuaded, may be affirmed of the other branches of our Government. But, after a close scrutiny of the points which alone you have selected for animadversion, it is not discerned that the rights of France are, in any degree, impaired.

In saying this, I must call to your recollection the manner in which the making of treaties is arranged by our constitution. The Senate advise and consent to their being made; the President ratifies them; and the courts are afterwards at liberty to construe them as particular cases arise requiring their decision. The opinions, therefore, of the President are not obligatory on the courts. He judges for himself; they judge for themselves; and if, in the interpretation of the one or the other, the rights of the French republic are assailed, the accustomed modes of revision and negotiation will still be open, and the principles upon which national redress is demanded will still have their force.

After this explanation, I proceed to state to you the result of the President's reflections on your expectations from the proposed treaty.

These expectations are, 1st, that the 23d and 24th articles of our commercial treaty with France are violated by the 17th and 18th of the proposed treaty; 2dly, that the 17th article of the former is destroyed by the 23d, 24th, and 25th articles of the latter; and 3dly, that the last sentence in the first paragraph of the 25th article of the proposed treaty, as you apprehend it, appears a new article added to the United States and France.

First, the essence of your objection, as drawn from the reasons you assigned in your letter, is reducible to this statement: By the treaty with France, hemp, flax, tar, pitch, ropes, cables, sails, sail cloth, anchors, masts, planks, boards, and beams, of what trees soever, and all other things proper for building or repairing vessels, (for which the President, as it is represented in the clearest manner by the contracting parties, even to places belonging to an enemy; such only excepted as are not actually besieged, blocked up, or invested. But the proposed treaty designates as contraband, timber for ship building, tar or resin, copper in sheets, saws, hemp, and cordage, and whatever may serve directly to the equipment of vessels, (unwrought iron and fir planks only excepted) and they are declared to be just objects of confiscation whenever they shall be attempted to be carried to an enemy. From hence you conclude that the United States may freely carry into England all things proper for the building or repairing of vessels, without fearing any obstacle from France, while they can carry none into England, and that they have thus granted to England a right which France enjoys not, and which, in the course of the existing war, inclines the balance in favor of England.

The United States have certainly opposed the extension of contraband, whenever the British Government has sought to swell the catalogue. But it never could be denied, under the law of nations, and independently of a treaty, that these articles were contraband. The proposed treaty then does not grant, but recognizes only a right to Great Britain, which, even without that recognition, she would have possessed and exercised.

This recognition might have been omitted or inserted, without changing the nature of the subject; though it was more natural, in commercial arrangements, to particularize the articles of contraband.

It was, indeed, anxiously desired to diminish the list as much as possible. But if no reciprocity could accomplish this end; if no equivalent could be offered by us to Great Britain powerful enough to induce her to renounce such a privilege in us, she was as much interested as she is in preventing it, and it should have been exerted by force. To become a party in the war, was neither our policy nor the wish of your republic. To become a party in the war for a cause which the armed neutrality itself never would have asserted, would have been supported by no civilized nation.

The United States have, therefore, wilfully surrendered no right relative to contraband.

Nor is the treaty with France contravened by this acknowledgment of contraband. It stipulates that, if France be at war, and the vessels of the United States carry naval stores to her enemy, French cruisers shall not capture them. This protection extends to the right of Great Britain to seize such vessels. The inference is, that France has relaxed her strict rights, in consideration that the United States have relaxed theirs, and not that Great Britain will not relax hers. The treaty with France, therefore, remains uninfluenced by the proposed compact with Great Britain.

The true light in which the subject is to be viewed, is that which you have caught, when you allude to the effect which the right of Great Britain to seize naval stores going from the United States to France may have upon her interest, while she continues bound not to seize like stores going from the United States to England.

Our treaty with France was entered into with a perfect knowledge, on both sides, that they were striking out, from the class of contraband articles which the law of nations denominated such. They were both apprized that, if the United States should be at war with Great Britain, the shipping of France, carrying naval stores to Great Britain, could not be seized by American cruisers; while the same shipping bringing naval stores to the United States might be seized by British cruisers. They saw, therefore, the reciprocity of the prohibition. Why then was not a similar case, as to the supposed embargo onAaron, the American vessels, admitted into French harbors, perhaps from a belief that it was not over important. Perhaps, on the part of the United States, from a confidence that their internal supplies would be ample; and on that of France, that their home resources, their own ships and convoys, would accommodate them with those stores. Or, more possibly, neither of the contracting Powers would have conceded this point, than which it is certain no other point in the treaty was more disputed. It may be, the proposed treaty does not vary the situation of France, nor better the rights of Great Britain, in one lot of contraband.

There was a time, indeed, when France felt herself absolved from the stipulation that free ships make free goods, because Great Britain, by capturing hostile property in American bottoms, rendered disadvantageous to France to spare British property in those bottoms. But the law of the 13th Nivose, in the 3d year, to which you refer, has banished that mode of reasoning, and has created a precedent for our mode.

Hitherto, however, I have spoken upon principles of right. Upon any other principles; and more especially upon those of hardship and injury to a friend, it shall be a topic of the negotiation now opening between us. With the temper which will pervade the whole of it, I cannot doubt that some modification may be devised; and it may be separated from the general treaty, as not to be delayed.

Second: In my judgment you misconceive the proposed treaty when you imagine that the English will have a right to claim the execution of the 23d and 24th articles of it, in derogation of the 17th article of our treaty with France; that is to say, that, in the course of the present war, they may conduct their prizes, made from the French, into the ports of the United States. They will not possess such a privilege during the present, or any other war with France. For "nothing in the proposed treaty contained shall be construed or operate contrary to former and existing public treaties with other sovereigns or States." The British plenipotentiary was here admonished of our prior engagements, and of our determination to postpone to them any new contract with Great Britain. Our treaties have always been saved by the general description, which was the most eligible form of expression, because it was shorter, and equally well adapted to comprehend all our treaties. It is the same form of expression with that which was adopted in the year 1786, in the treaty between France and Great Britain.

The 40th article of the last mentioned treaty, and the 23d and 24th article of the proposed treaty, are, in substance, alike; and yet it was clearly and properly understood, when the French and English treaty was made, that our commercial treaty with France was not in this respect shaken. We have, at least, never complained of any infraction of ours from this cause, and, therefore, are sincere in believing that France can be as little affected by our treaty with Great Britain, as Great Britain can be affected by our treaty with France.

In your quotation of the 33d article of the treaty with Great Britain, you observe, that "the vessels of the United States are to be received with hospitality in the ports of the United States. They are the "ships of war," the public navy, not the privateers, which are to be so received. Now the British ships of war are not prohibited by our treaty with France. On the contrary, we have a comprehensive clause, under certain exceptional circumstances. From these they are not relieved by the proposed treaty; because our treaty with France, which is a supreme law of the land, is decisively contrary.

The 23d article of the proposed treaty is, with very small, and unessential difference, the same with the 16th article of the French treaty with Great Britain.

And here it is necessary to observe that the right of France arising from our treaty of commerce; but the treaty between France and Great Britain does not, by any general or particular expression, save the rights of the United States, which might stand in opposition to that sixteenth article. We have never renounced, because we always thought ourselves secure under the faith of France and its law of nations.

Third. Upon the third and last head of objection, which you urge against the proposed treaty, little need be said. You shall continue to enjoy your rights under the seventeenth article of our treaty with France. We will not ask you to renounce the advantages which that article assures to you. To them, on which, you pay so much stress, in your letter of the 13th, we do not object, except in the far more serious and disadvantageous case of the proposed treaty.

And here it may be observed, that if the proposed treaty would exempt from the consequences of violation of the treaty, the old one, would be prevented by the twenty-fifth article, the consequence may be easily avoided, by declaring that so much of the old one is connected with any particular, for which it may be desirable to retain a priority, shall remain in force. This is a remedy so obvious that I flatter myself it will remove any difficulty in the way of a new negotiation.

Should an embarrassment still hang upon these points, I must entreat you to afford me an opportunity of meeting them before your communications are despatched to the committee of public safety.

I have the honor to be, sir,
EDM. RANDOLPH.

No. 98.
Mr. Pickering, Secretary of War, charged with the Department of State, to Mr. James Monroe, Minister Plenipotentiary at Paris.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, September 12, 1799.

Sir: The office of Secretary of State being at present vacant by the resignation of Mr. Randolph, I have it in command from the President to acknowledge your letters, dated November 7th, 1794, January 13, February 12, 18, March 6, 7, 12, 13, May 7, 17, June 14 and 26, and to communicate such information as the present state of things appears to require.

We have already been furnished with a copy of the treaty lately negotiated between the United States and Great Britain; but, lest that should have miscarried, you will find another enclosed. This treaty has, after the most mature deliberation, been ratified by the President, on the condition proposed by the Senate, and has been transmitted to London. On the presumption that it will receive an equivalent ratification on the part of Great Britain, we shall not propose to treat further in the two following observations, unless the facts, and the opinions of the Government, especially as it appears probable, from your letters, and from the movements of disaffected persons here, that unfavorable impressions upon the Government and people of France may be apprehended. As we have ever been most sincerely desirous of cultivating friendship with that nation, the most prompt and candid measures were taken in every stage of the negotiation to produce tranquility and satisfaction, which the rules prescribed by custom in such cases would justify or permit. The result, now made public, will evince that the rights of France, whether founded on the laws of nations, or their treaties with us, remain unviolated and undisturbed.

The only case you have mentioned, and which was specially left to stipulate nothing with Great Britain contrary to the engagements of the United States to France, this part of the President's instructions was officially communicated to Mr. Fanchet, the minister of the republic, and independently of the obligation imposed upon our envoy, the honor of the Government became pledged to refuse the ratification of any article derogatory from our engagements to France, which might be inadvertently admitted by our negotiators. Accordingly, soon after the decision of the Senate had been given, and previous to the ratification by the President, Mr. Adet, the present minister, was furnished with a copy of the treaty, and requested to communicate his observations on it. A copy of his letter, and of the reply of the Secretary of State, are enclosed, by which you will perceive the nature of the objections which were urged, and that such explanations were immediately given, and such constructions adopted, as must have been satisfactory. We infer this from the explanations themselves than from the subsequent silence of the minister.

The late conduct of Great Britain, in seizing the vessels of the United States laden with provisions, and bound to France is, however, calculated to create inquietudes; it is therefore proper to explain the 18th article more particularly as Mr. Randolph has done, especially as this part of the treaty has been misrepresented in this country as being unfriendly to France.

If it is to be supposed that the United States have a powerful interest in diminishing, by treaty, the catalogue of contraband articles as much as possible; to this they are invited no less by their pacific policy, which inclines them to cultivate and extend neutral rights, than by the operation of the law of nations upon several valuable articles of export, which would, probably, be suspended, if the treaty in question is accepted with its immediate interests; accordingly, the most zealous exertions have been uniformly made by the United States to establish principles favorable to free commerce. A time of war was, however, most unfavorable for this purpose, especially when the object, as in the present case, was to induce a powerful maritime nation to make concessions to the neutral and contraband trade.

The result of the negotiation with Great Britain has therefore shown that she will not relax, in our favor, from the strict maxims of the law of nations defining contraband, the principles of which are adopted in the treaty. Thus, though the power of several kinds of neutral property, in the British dominions, has, by special treaties, admitted to be articles of free commerce, yet it is believed that not a single one is included as contraband which has not been ranked as such by approved writers on the law of nations. It is not, therefore, correctly said that we have relinquished any neutral rights, the exercise of which would have been beneficial to the United States. It has been the hope of the British nation, that the treaty will be a proof of their intention to relax in this particular, and that the treaty has been received from them as such.

The treaty has barely recited in the list of contraband what was before so, under a law which we could not mitigate; and, though we were desirous of relaxing the rigor of this law, yet a recital of it, in the present treaty, was the best which could be done, and was necessary, in order to admonish our maritime and commercial citizens of a law which has so existed.

The second clause of the 18th article clearly refers to the doctrine asserted by Great Britain, that provisions may be contraband when destined to places not invested or blockaded. To this pretension, which is contrary to our interests, and, as we are inclined to understand, to the law of nations, especially in the extent in which the American United States could not accede. The opinions of our Government, on this subject, formerly expressed, are well known to you, being amply detailed in the correspondence of Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Pinckney, in the year 1793. Though we have not been able to induce Great Britain to relinquish her construction, we have taken the means of removing it; and in this particular, when our commerce, or the commerce of any neutral nation, is denominated to be contraband, shall become such, and, for that reason, be seized, they shall not be confiscated, but paid for, with a reasonable mercurial profit, including freight and the expenses incident to the detention.

It is obvious that, if the British construction of the law of nations were admitted to be just, the stipulation in the treaty that, under this construction, “the property of a neutral which shall become contraband, shall be confiscated,” must be regarded as a partial renunciation of our treaty rights. It will be perceived, by the article which we are about to point out, that, in this particular, the treaty is substantially what we have expressed it.”

This article was of such a nature as to be susceptible of being successfully resisted by force, is a question which it pertains to the proper authorities of the United States to decide. They are the exclusive judges and competent guardians of whatever concerns our interests, policy, and honor; and, on these subjects, they will never ask the advice, nor be governed by the counsels of any foreign nation whatever. We acknowledge ourselves bound to stipulate nothing which may derogate from our prior engagements. This we have not done by the present treaty, and this we will never do. Even in cases where we are not bound by treaty, we will not stipulate to surrender our rights, as a neutral nation, to the injury of our friends; but we must be left to determine in what manner we can most beneficially obtain an evil, and when it is proper for us to repel an injury. The peace of Europe is at this moment, to a great degree, suspended, and whether it will be a blessing, or a curse, to our nation, is a painful uncertainty. The dignified and manly manner in which the British Government has conducted the negociations of the present year, has become the admiration of all the civilized world, and every feeling is, that it is the union of our interests and British interests, that can render the present war happy to our nation. The British nation and Government have, we believe, the opinion in their favor.

The degree of security which we enjoy is well known to depend more upon the common wants of the nations at war, than upon any exactions which were an immediate cause of an offensive nature. Indeed nothing of this kind could be attempted by us without a total sacrifice of our commerce. How preposterous is that policy which requires us to abandon and destroy the very object, for the preservation of which we are invited to commence hostilities.

It may not be amiss to dilate on the consequences of our engaging in the war with Great Britain.

First. Seeing she has the command of the sea, (and appearances strongly indicate that she will maintain that command) our commerce might, in one year, be annihilated, and thousands of our seamen be shut up, or dying in gales of rage, and thousands of our citizens would be transported to the extremities of America to escape from the object so alluring and so available as the American commerce should present. If we look back to the two last years of our Revolution war, a judgment may be formed on this point. A striking defect in her naval arrangements, in preceding years, left our ports open for the enemy of commerce; for the equipping of privateers; and the shipping of the enemy. The whole of that period can be described by sentinels at the entrance of ports, which small privateers were hauled up, as no longer able to cope even with their armed merchantmen, and the larger privateers were taken. Our mercantile shipping fell, at the same time, a sacrifice to the vigilant operations of the British nation. The moment her naval power is extended beyond all former examples, while that of her enemies is, at least, not increased.

Second. Our landed, as well as commercial interests would suffer; beyond all calculation. Agriculture, above all the objects of our wants, would be suspended, or its produce perish on our hands. The value of our lands and every species of domestic property would sink.

Third. The sources of revenue failing, public credit would be destroyed, and multitudes of our citizens, now depending on its preservation, be involved in ruin. The people at large, from the summit of prosperity, would be precipitated into misery, which so often has been the case of nations who were, from the mismanagement of their affairs, such an object so alluring and so available as the American commerce should present. If we look back to the two last years of our Revolution war, a judgment may be formed on this point. A striking defect in her naval arrangements, in preceding years, left our ports open for the enemy of commerce; for the equipping of privateers; and the shipping of the enemy. The whole of that period can be described by sentinels at the entrance of ports, which small privateers were hauled up, as no longer able to cope even with their armed merchantmen, and the larger privateers were taken. Our mercantile shipping fell, at the same time, a sacrifice to the vigilant operations of the British nation. The moment her naval power is extended beyond all former examples, while that of her enemies is, at least, not increased.

Fourth. Under the circumstances mentioned, a war with Great Britain would be essentially injurious to France. We have a commercial treaty lined (as not without) with which we should be an end to our intercourse with France; and it is by our commerce only that we can give her any valuable aid. Men she wants not; and if she did want, we could not transport them. But while we continue our neutrality, the benefits we may render to France, and her colonies, are immense. And although the renewal of the order for commerce be a necessary consideration, yet the tenor of the 18th article of our late treaty with Great Britain, though with some a subject of clamor, will remedy, in a degree, the mischievous tendency of that order: for the article, far from giving a right to Great Britain to capture privateers on the American coast, when, by the law of nations, they may be declared to be a contraband of war. They are not to be confiscated, but paid for, with a reasonable mercantile profit. What will be the operation of this provision? Will it check or encourage adventures to France? We think the latter. For if our vessels reach the French ports, all the expected profits of the voyage will be gained. If they are taken by the British, we consider it as a good day for our shipping. Consequently, if we do not promote the exportation of provisions for France: for, in the event of arrival or capture, the American merchant is certain of making a profitable voyage.
States to obtain from her some stipulation, which, without admitting her claim, would not leave our commerce to future relations without any definite means of liquidation or redress.

Some men, forgetting their own professed principles, when they advert only to our relation to Great Britain, forgetting that they are the citizens of an independent State, have said that, while France, with whom we have a treaty of amity and commerce, was at war, it ought not to enjoy a similar treaty, by which our situation would be changed. But where is the principle, to support this rule? and where will it find any limits? We have treaties with many other Powers, one or the other of whom may be always at war: are we never then to make another treaty?

One has said, France will be displeased. This we should regret; for two reasons: one, because we really wish to please our old and friendly allies; the other, because we desire to see, and doubt not we shall see, her deportment towards us correspond with her own fundamental principle, that every independent nation has an exclusive right to manage its own affairs. All our external duties centre here—that in our new engagements we violate no principle of negotiation.

That France should manifest a watchful jealousy of any connexions we might form with her ancient and inveterate enemy, is perfectly natural. It is the same spirit which prompted her to afford us that efficient aid, which was so important to us, in achieving our independence. The breaking off so large a portion of the British empire, the powers of a formidable rival was essentially diminished. No wonder she should now be alive to the remotest prospect of re-union—not of government, but of interests and good will. But, to the following positions you may give all the solemnity of truth:

That the late negotiation has not proceeded from any predilection in our Government towards Great Britain. We abide by our original declaration respecting the British: “we hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends.”

Second. That from the remembrances of a long, bloody, and distressing war, from which we were just beginning to recover, and to taste the blessings of peace, whatever even seemed to tend to a renewal of it, was seriously deprecated.

Third. That there were many causes of difference between us and Great Britain, the adjustment of which admitted of no longer delay. One was the detention of the western posts, under a real or affected belief that the United States were the first to infringe the peace of 1783. From this detention resulted a bloody and expensive Indian war, a loss of revenue by a suspension of the sale of lands; and a deprivation of the fair trade. To these were added fresh excitements to a most destructive war, and the want of a fixed point of reference. Our different acts on the other hands had risen to a height that required an immediate remedy. War or negotiation were the alternatives. We chose the latter. Had this failed, war seemed scarcely avoidable. But in that case, these good effects were counted upon. The consciousness of using the proper means of averting so great a calamity; union among ourselves, when war should have been avoided; and division among others, who should have refused an amicable settlement of our just demands; besides which we gained time for preparation.

Fourth. That the commercial part of the treaty, though not unimportant, was but a subordinate object, and at the same time not a new measure. This is well known to every well informed citizen of the United States. It is a fact that a commercial treaty has been sought after ever since the peace; under the old Government, and since the establishment of the new one. It is a fact that, upon the arrival of Mr. Hammond, the British minister, and an intimation that he was empowered to enter into commercial arrangements, he was met with agility by Mr. Jefferson, the Secretary of State and when it was discovered that his powers extended only to an inconclusive discussion of this subject, disappointment and chagrin were the result. It may be added that measures have been proposed and supported in the Legislature, the sole object of which was, to force Great Britain into a commercial treaty.

Fifth. That the Government of the United States is sincerely friendly to the French nation. The latter doubts less here than the body of American citizens are well affected towards them. The belief is well founded. But it is equally applicable to those in the administration of the government. If any thing could weaken this general attachment, it would be a recurrence to such disorganizing projects and outrages on the sovereignty and dignity of the United States as marked and disgraced the ministry of Genet. The precipitate, and, in the main, ill-founded resolutions of a few small popular meetings, are not to be taken as true indications of the American sentiment; very different is the opinion of the great body of the people. These are beyond example prosperous, contented, and happy.

Where any symptoms of another nature have appeared, they are to be traced to ignorant or perverse misrepresentations of the treaty. This, as it becomes better understood, is more and more approved.

That the treaty would settle every point in dispute entirely to our satisfaction, and secure to us all the commercial advantages we could wish for, no reasonable man could expect. Our antagonists, too, have claims, opinions, and wishes. And where there are opposing interests, nations, as well as individuals, are likely to make erroneous estimates of each other. When, however, the great and important interests at issue are traced as we do, to our advantage, and weightier points more to our advantage, the terms as we see them were adopted. The Senate, after a very deliberate discussion and consideration of the treaty, in all its relations, advised its ratification, on the condition stated in their resolution; and that resolution has the approbation of the President.

His desire to afford them greater weight than any other wishes, we are disposed to think that his assent will be given: for it is the interest of Great Britain not to increase the number of her enemies, or to deprive herself of the benefits of a commercial intercourse with the United States. It is not less our interest to remain at peace. And the President, as the first minister of the republic, until he should have been removed, was the fact, they ought to have applied to some, and perhaps none, of the points here stated. It is. But as the women who have frequently discovered in similar cases, the promises I have made to prosecute those who should violate the neutrality of the United States, the punctuality with which these promises have been fulfilled, should have induced those officers to inform the functionaries of the French republic, even if it had not been their duty to do so,

With great respect, I am, sir, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

No. 29.

Joseph Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

New York, the 3d Vendémiaire, (Sept. 23, 1794, O. S.), 2d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: A recent violation both of the sovereignty of the French republic, and of the treaties you have contracted with her, has just taken place at New York. Some men, in the employment of the custom house I suppose, went on board the Favorite, a French ship of war, and carried off effects belonging to the republic: one of the persons who executed this outrage being found guilty of the the sacrilege I was the fite of the 31st September with a stroke of his sword. His threats terminated by hoisting the flag of the corsairs. This was respected by the French; but ours was insulted in an outrageous manner. I request justice against the authors of this infliction of the law of nations. It is to a free Government I address myself, and I shall obtain it.

It is pretended, sir, at least from everything I can learn, that a privateer, fitted for a cruise, had deposited arms on board, and that this pretext was used for visiting and pillaging the Favorite, a vessel answering as a store ship for the military use of the United States. The conduct I have frequently discovered in similar cases, the promises I have made to prosecute those who should violate the neutrality of the United States, the punctuality with which these promises have been fulfilled, should have induced those officers to inform the functionaries of the French republic, even if it had not been their duty to do so.
Nothing can justify this outrage. If an unfaithful or weak keeper had committed a fault, it were sufficient to inform me of it; I should have delivered him to his proper judges, and the Americans would not have overlooked their rights, and offended an ally attached to them by so many ties.

Accept my esteem.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States, to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

PHILADELPHIA, September 25, 1794.

SIR: I regret extremely that any citizen of the United States, and, more especially, if he be in authority, should offer either outrage or insult to a vessel of the French republic. I have accordingly written to the attorney of the district of New York, to inquire into and report the facts, as you will perceive from the enclosed copy. The course might have been shortened by directing him to proceed in the case as the law directs. But this has not been adopted, because we wish to reserve to ourselves the decision in this particular, as it is suggested that a public officer is concerned, and we take an interest in causing justice to be done to the French republic, as far as possible, under our own eye.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Harrison, District Attorney of New York.

PHILADELPHIA, September 25, 1794.

SIR: I have the honor of enclosing you the translation of a letter from the minister of the French republic, complaining of an outrage on a French vessel of war. Resolved, as we are, to act with good faith and friendship towards our ally, I must request you to inquire into the facts, and transmit what shall be found to be an accurate state of them, in order that Government may proceed to do what is proper and honorable on the occasion.

I am, &c.

No. 32.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

PHILADELPHIA, November 17, 1794.

SIR: The Executive of the United States being obliged to collect information of facts at a distance through the public officers, and having a confidence in them, it was conceived sufficient, in the first instance, merely to transmit to you the evidence which had been obtained respecting the Favorite. Hence, in the letter which I had the honor of writing to you on the 22d ultimo, I did no more than note the enclosures, reserving any reflections until I should be ascertained on your part, whether the allegations were true.

The opinion which the President has formed relieves both you and myself of no small difficulty in comparing and weighing the testimony. He has thought proper to instruct me to inform you that, on the faith which he always reposes in your assertions, he takes these points for granted: that the Favorite is a public vessel of war, bearing the commission of the French republic; and that no contravention of the act prohibiting the exportation of military stores was meditated in the application of those which were found on board.

The President highly disapproves that a public vessel of war, belonging to a foreign nation, should be searched by officers of the customs, upon a suspicion of illicit commerce. The propriety of representing such a suspicion to the consul of that nation, or the commander of the vessel, will not be controverted, this being a course respectful and customary. A general instruction will, therefore, be given to pursue this course, with the view, that, if it should be ineffectual, the Government of the United States may adopt those measures which the necessity of the case and their rights may require.

A particular instruction, founded on the same principles, will be also forwarded to the collector of New York; with this addition, to discontinue the prosecution against the property, and restore what may be within his power or command. At the same time I must repeat the assurance which we entertain, that you will prevent the stores from being used in any manner contrary to the act before referred to.

I flatter myself, sir, that this reparation of what is past, and the precaution against the future, will manifest such a disposition in our Government as will induce you to approve the decision which a sense of justice imposes upon the President to waive any further measures: for the appearance and circumstances of the Favorite might have misled the best intended man into a misapprehension of her real character. And, in truth, something is due to the consideration that, in our new situation, it cannot be expected that all our officers should meet every occurrence with a correct knowledge of the usages of nations.

An insult to the French flag will not be tolerated by the President, whenever he can prevent or punish it. But the depositions do not place this subject in so clear a light as to prove its existence, or to designate the culpable person. It is the President’s purpose, therefore, to cause the officers of the customs to be admonished to respect your flag; and if this be not satisfactory, and you are still persuaded that an insult has been committed, I shall be ready to concur in any arrangement which may be convenient, for the full examination of such other witnesses as may be produced.

I have the honor to be, &c.

SIR: This moment I have received the enclosed copy of a letter from the collector of New York to the Secretary of the Treasury. Although the subject of the Favorite has been long ago adjusted, I think it proper to hand to you any explanation, which may come to my hands.

Mr. Lamb, Collector of New York, to the Secretary of the Treasury.

New York, November 29, 1794.

Sir:
I acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 29th instant, respecting the articles seized on board the French ship the Favorite, and agreeably to your directions have ordered them to be restored.

At the time the seizure was made, the Favorite having been totally dismantled, her crew sent on board other ships of war, and her sails, rigging, and other materials, having been sold at public auction, she was considered as a hulk; otherwise, the event would not have taken place.

With respect to the charge, that the officers of the customs had pulled down the national flag on board of the above mentioned vessel, and hoisted another in its place, it is groundless, as will appear by the papers transmitted to the Secretary of State, by Mr. Harrison, the district attorney.

I am, with great respect, sir, &c.

Sir:
Information has been given to the President of the United States that the privateer, called la Carmagnole, which has always been considered as one of those fitted out in opposition to the sense of our Government, is now in the river Delaware. This vessel is represented to retain still her warlike apparatus. It is probable that you have not been informed that she was ordered to quit our ports, or to be dismantled. But, notwithstanding this injunction, her military qualities are not yet laid aside, and she continues to go out and come into our ports. I am confident, sir, that you will disapprove of this proceeding, and that you will render it unnecessary for the President to execute the determination which he finds himself compelled to make, under the circumstances of the case, that la Carmagnole be dismantled. The readiness with which you complied with the wish of the Government on a similar occasion induces me to hope that you will issue orders for dismantling her; and prevent the President from taking on this subject, those measures which he wishes to avoid.

The expedition with which this privateer moves will naturally suggest to you the propriety of my requesting that your interference should be as prompt as possible.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

Philadelphia, 29th Thermidor, 3d year of the French republic, (16th August, 1794, O. S.)

Sir:
I inform you that the uneasiness testifed by the Government of the United States, relative to the Columbia, which was supposed to be in the Delaware, is groundless. This vessel received an order from me on the 4th instant to put to sea immediately. If she has not executed it, she must have been prevented by the English forces or by the necessity of making some indispensable repairs, before the voyage she is about to undertake.

Accept my respect.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

Philadelphia, August 20, 1794.

Sir:
I should have done myself the honor before this day of transmitting to you a copy of certain rules, instituted by the President of the United States in relation to the belligerent Powers, if I had not taken it for granted that your intercourse with your predecessor had rendered it unnecessary. But I take the liberty of now enclosing them, as having a direct connexion with my letter to you of the 14th instant, and with your reply on the 16th.

The correspondence from the Department of State with Mr. Genet will inform you of the motives upon which these rules are founded. They have created a system of obligation on our part towards those Powers, and therefore require our attention.

But the Carmagnole (or Columbia) has been the subject of particular letters from Governor Clinton to Mr. Genet, and the French consul at New York; and the result has been an assurance that she should no longer offend those rules. This assurance has produced a great degree of anxiety that she should not now enter our ports, under the circumstances which were first offensive to the Government, and contrary to its sense, as has been often expressed concerning her. It is very far from the wish of the President that your despatches should be at any time interrupted. The step of dismantling which is desired is merely to fail in an engagement which has been frequently made.

Whether the Carmagnole be at present in the Delaware, we cannot at this place ascertain. If she has sailed, I have only to communicate to you the hope and expectation of the President that you will, by your orders, prevent her from returning to our ports in her military equipment. If she has not sailed, we must repeat our confidence that you will cause her to be dismantled. The rules above referred to will not permit an illicit privateer, as she has been deemed to be, to make any reparations within the United States.

Permit me to request an early answer to this letter, and to learn that you will direct the necessary measures to be immediately adopted, and cut off the painful necessity of measures, adequate to the end being pursued by the Government.

I have the honor, sir, to be, &c.

Philadelphia, 4th Fructidor, (21st August, 1794, O. S.) 3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:
I told you verbally, and repeat it in writing, that the Cornelia and the Columbia had sailed for France. Then my intention was, that they should not return armed into the ports of the United States. But they were compelled to take shelter by the pursuit of the English vessels of war, which at this time block up all your ports. It would be...

as unjust as unreasonable to impute to them as a crime this return, which was rendered necessary by so unhappy a circumstance unless it be wished that these two vessels should become the prey of the English; and I avow it with profound sorrow, that I have been tempted to entertain this opinion, when I learnt that, at New York, orders had been given to the Cornelia immediately to quit that port, although it was known that two English frigates were to have seized her on her departure. But, sir, it is too painful for me to harbor a doubt injurious to the public officers of a free nation, to give myself up to this impression; and, at the same time, it is too grateful to me to prove with what strictness we fulfill our treaties and our engagements, to omit giving you the following details.

The first of these two vessels was the Cornelia, destined, to be there completely disarmed. The second, the Columbia, which was in the Delaware, departed thence on the 14th of this month. I am surprised, sir, that you were not informed of her departure, with as much care as you were of her arrival. Perhaps it was not the duty of the same person to give the two advices, which might have prevented your complaints against the Federal Government, if with so much exactness the new obligations which it has imposed upon itself, in relation to England, is not just to require from it the same scrupulous observance of sacred treaties, which it has long since contracted with France? Why, then, is an asylum refused to an unoffensive barque, which in its flight had thrown into the sea some of her cannon and of her water, when it is given, though against the tenor of these very treaties, to the vessels of war which have taken prizes from the citizens of the republic? Without doubt, sir, this violation, which is so fatal to us, takes place through forgetfulness only. It would be horrible to me to attribute it to any other motive; therefore, I content myself with subjoining here an extract of the 17th article, in order to recall it to your remembrance.

"Art. 17th. And on the contrary, no asylum or retreat shall be given in their ports or harbors to those who shall have taken prizes from the subjects of His Majesty or the said States; and if they are compelled to enter them by tempest or the danger of the seas, they shall be obliged to depart as soon as possible."

Neither test nor the danger of the seas have compelled the English vessels of war to enter your ports; notwithstanding, they have been there supplied; notwithstanding, they remain there to interrupt your commerce and our supplies; and notwithstanding, we are your nearest allies.

Accept, sir, &c.

J. H. FAUCHET.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

PHILADELPHIA, September 7, 1794.

SIR:—Feeling, and at all times acknowledging, as the President of the United States does, the obligations of our treaty with your nation; and banishing every consideration which comes into competition with them, he read, not without regret, the following passage in your letter of the 21st ultimo:

"Why, then, was an asylum refused to an unhappy barque, which in its flight had thrown into the sea a part of its cannon and of its water, while it was granted, contrary to the tenor of these very treaties, to vessels of war, which had taken prizes from us? Without doubt, sir, this is so fatal to us, as it is so fatal to us, has arisen from forgetfulness only. It would be horrible to me to attribute it to any other motive. I therefore content myself with subjoining hereto an extract from the 17th article, to recall it to your remembrance." &c.

There was, sir, during the existence of your predecessor's functions, a period at which we were obliged to summon all the strength and force of our friendship for the French republic, to combat the various forms of aggression which he offered to our Government. But let these be now buried in eternal oblivion, scaled, as it has been, by the justice rendered to our wishes, in the removal of him, and in the deporation of his successor. This period is therefore revived for a moment, merely for the purpose of referring you to those remonstrances which are to be found among your papers of office, and which speak the sensibility of the United States as to the equipment of priva-teers within their limits. And it is recollected, even now, not from the most distant apprehension that the measure will be repeated under your countenance, but to point to the reasons which produced our solicitude on the occasion.

Except vessels of this description, all belonging to the French republic or French citizens, have been admitted into our ports with cordiality. Where an asylum in general has been refused to any, it was a consequence of an infringement of our sovereignty. If, in the particular instance to which you allude, the denial of asylum has been aggravated by circumstances of improper severity, it is more than we knew, until your communication: it is what the President would and most distinctly disapprove.

If your interpretation of the treaty of commerce be accurate, that is, if no ship of war, which had made prize of French vessels, could be received into our ports, still no complaint of this kind has yet reached the Executive of the United States from any functionary of France, or any other authority in the same. But it would be uncandid to conceal from you the construction which we have hitherto deemed the true one. The first part of the 17th article refers to French ships of war and privateers, entering our ports with their prizes: the second contrasts the situation of the enemies of France by forbidding such as shall have made prize of the French; intimating from this connexion of the two articles, that to remove their prizes, or to secure them by other means, is to infringe the 17th. This section of the treaty was principally destined to the withholding of protection or succor to the prizes themselves. Had it been otherwise, it would have been superfluous to have prohibited in the 20th article foreign privateers from seizing vessels at the request of the citizens of the United States.

Be assured, sir, of this truth: that it would be found a reflection to the President of the United States if our treaties with the French nation had ever been infringed with his assents and further, that, if they ever shall be, he will be ready, as he always has been, to hear and inquire, and to cause offences against them to be punished, errors to be rectified, and injuries to be duly compensated.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, the 3d of the Sans Culottes, (18th September, 1794, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR:—In assuring me of the true sentiments of the President you do no more than confirm the opinion I have entertained of his virtues, and especially of his sincerity and attachment to the sublime cause of liberty, for which he has fought, as the French republicans are now fighting. It is very agreeable to me to partake of this opinion with all the French republicans, by laying my trust in the hands which I believe to have been made upon treaties which unite our two nations? He has not done the injury, he has refused the remedy. It was not then reproaches I made to him, but an opportunity I afforded him of exercising his natural inclination to do what is just and becoming the nation he represents, and by whom he is justly venerated.

In speaking of him, sir, you enter into a subject which I have been induced to avoid, by the necessity imposed upon me by circumstances that might have been discovered by your answer, and the reflections it contains; rendered necessary still more by the recent persecutions which the French are made to suffer by the servile submission of the subaltern agents of the Executive of the United States to the requirements of the French republic. Unfortunately I cannot, but I am embarrassed in the choice of facts which occur to support this last assertion. Before I cite them, it is necessary for me to correct an important error.
which has slipped into your despatch. You tell me, "If your construction of the treaty of commerce has deceived you," &c. This implies two facts, which I equally oppose. The first is, that the article which I have cited may be susceptible of several constructions; the second is, that I have given an arbitrary meaning to this article. You forsake these two constructions to stand upon a matter favourable to your enemies, a part of the treaty which it is necessary totally to refute, if your interpretation is adopted. I am thus forced to use the words as I do. I assert, when I say, that the import literally expressed is not the true import, and to substantiate an ambiguity for a very clear and positive statement.

"The first part of the 17th article relates to French ships of war and privateers, entering our ports with their prizes; the second presents a precise contrast. The connexion of the contrast which exists between these two clauses, therefore, intimates that the vessels forbidden are those which bring their prizes with them." But, it is not to be granted, I say, that this article is to require a construction. You will thereby see at once, that the said vessels (capturing) or their prizes, (which proves that both have an equal right to this privilege) cannot be arrested or seized, whether, &c. and, in the second part of the article you will find, "That, on the contrary, no vessel, &c. shall be thereby taken (to such as apply to think), but to such as capture," It may be well to observe to you, sir, that, by capturing, is always understood the whole fleet, and not the particular vessels of that fleet which may have made the prizes. The matter then is not alone, as you seem desirous of understanding it, to refuse all succor to prizes, but also to affirm, that they are entitled to such succor as they may seek. When you come in, being forced by stress of weather, or the danger of the sea, all proper means shall be used that they go out and retire from thence as soon as possible. Hence the want of repairs after a battle, of which a prize might be supposed to be the consequence, a desire to take in provisions, in order to prolong a cruise without returning to the ports of their native land, are not, as you esteem them, sufficient titles for our enemies to obtain an entry into your ports. Hence, the principal advantage which the allied nations wished mutually to assure to each other by this article, was not so much to make the difficulty of disembarrassing themselves of, or selling their prizes, felt by their enemies, as to prevent the practice of putting them back to their own country to virtual and supply themselves with provisions and water. This consequence naturally follows from the foregoing propositions, which would otherwise be without meaning and, therefore, would discover nothing but folly in the framers of the treaty, which is not susceptible. If their object was only to prohibit vessels of war to enter the ports of their friends, when the French prize-taking has been what you suppose, they would have formally expressed it; they would not have said, "Such as shall have made prize," but the vessels with their prizes. For my part, I cannot see in a treaty what it does not contain, and I cannot help seeing in a treaty what is clearly expressed. I closely adhere to the letter, when it has been done, in order to understand that the captors of French property should be driven from your ports. Nor English ships have made prizes: I thence conclude, that English ships should not find shelter in your ports: I thence conclude, that the asylum granted to them is a violation of our treaties. If it be true, as you wrote me, that the vessels on which the prize-taking was made, and my predecessors never complained of this violation, it was because, far from being, for causes of complaint, when we had reason, we have always respected the situation of the American Government, it was because the audacity and vexations, practised by the English against your commerce and the law of nations, increased in proportion as they gave you assurances of peace. It is far from the minds of the English to operate the long patience, which we owe to the ties of alliance between the United States and England, by making such acts of high-handedness, in fine, in which its prudence suggests to obtain justice; but I am grieved to see the commercial connexions of the French republic and the United States entirely dissolved by so many harassments. I am grieved to see the seizures which the English ships, at the make of a French frigate, are supposed to be bound for a French port. I am grieved to see the United States suffer in the silence of English proclamations, which are executed even upon their coasts. I am grieved that, even at this moment, an alliance between a free people and a Machiavelian Government is talked of. In supposing this rumor to be true, however monstrous such an alliance would be, if it were possible, it would rely so much on the sincerity with which the Executive of the United States keeps its engagements, as still to demand, with confidence, their execution.

An occasion now presents itself. Even adopting your construction of the treaty, it has just been violated at Norfolk. The French frigate Tenacious anchored there with a French privateer, called La Montague, which had been admirably furnished, in writing to the Governor of Virginia, against this infraction, and a length of time elapsed without the Governor’s desiring to give him an answer. I expect one from you, whereby I am, more surely, more, and, I say, with more favor, actuated in the sense which I consider to be the interest of your country, and which, I think, does no disservice to the public officers of the republic, that I am obliged to enter into some details relative to this affair. A Frenchman learned at Charleston the recapture of Guadeloupe; his first excitements excited him to go to the assistance of his newly arrived brethren; he purchased a sloop of a thirteen cannon, which he possessed before the purchase of the vessel. He notified the Governor of South Carolina of it, who, finding him armed simply for his own defence, and not for a cruise, made no objection. He sailed; an accident obliged him to go to Norfolk. He had narrowly escaped, when, on his way to that port, to be the protector of a man, which he supposed was an American papers belonging to the vessel he had bought it was justly observed to him, that, according to the laws of the United States, the transfer of a vessel to a foreigner made it necessary to give up the papers; he was then obliged, agreeable to the laws of France, to take out from the consulate a certificate of the purchase, to serve him until his arrival at the first French port. For the defense of his property he put on board, himself, and the American papers, I". Newport.
The French prize master wished to object to two English sailors, who, being improperly influenced, declared, under oath, that the French officer had killed a man at Charleston; and he was finally imprisoned.

Happily, the consul of the republic at Boston being informed of this strange persecution, sent his chancellor to Newport.

The chancellor found that, from just suspicions conceived against the two English sailors, and the impossibility of their giving security to appear at their criminal suit commenced against the prize master, they had been themselves committed to prison; that seeing themselves abandoned, uneasy about the consequences, perhaps repentent, they had confessed that their deposition was false; that, finally, they had retracted judicially, by confessions that they had been actuated by incitement; that, in the mean time, nobody was prosecuted but the two perjurers; and that the final enlargement of the prize master was defaced.

The chancellor, on his arrival, requested from the collector a communication of the papers of the prize; he requested him to send her to Providence, for the sake of greater security; and because an attempt had been made the night before, by the owner and the English sailors, to carry her off. He obtained neither, was obliged to protest, and went to Newport to claim justice from the Governor.

The Governor heard the case on the 20th of August. The English vice consul obtained its adjournment to a distant day, and appeared Nervous of gaining time. Finally, the prize was reserved to the customhouse; but, in the interval, she became injured, the costs of suit consumed a part of her value, and the privatesmen became discouraged.

I spare you, sir, an infinity of daily complaints, all of which equally disclose an extreme facility in a great number of the civil officers of the United States, of condensation to the first requisitions of the English agents, and who thereby second, no doubt involuntarily, the intrigues of our perpetual enemies. It would be very pleasing to me no more to be obliged to trouble you with the recital of the injustice and malevolence of which those men are the victims; who, after having harmed death, are compelled to submit to all the disgust of the most crouching charity, before they can obey the price of their blood; those men, finally, who are afraid of losing, in fulfilling the office of the lawyer, about which they know but little, that time which they might have better employed in purging your coasts of the pirates who devour your commerce.

Pardon, sir, the length of this dispatch; the importance of the matter which I have treated would not admit of any abbreviation by me, and had been set at liberty; but, in the interval, she became injured, the costs of suit consumed a part of her value, and the privatesmen became discouraged.

I spare you, sir, an infinity of daily complaints, all of which equally disclose an extreme facility in a great number of the civil officers of the United States, of condensation to the first requisitions of the English agents, and who thereby second, no doubt involuntarily, the intrigues of our perpetual enemies. Joseph Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

Philadelphia, 10th Vendémiaire, (Oct. 1, 1793, O. S.)

Sir: I send you the answer given by Mr. Lee, Governor of Virginia, to the vice consul of Norfolk, who claimed the execution of the seventeenth article of the treaty of commerce between France and the United States. I shall be obliged by your informing me what the instructions are, which this Governor could have received from the President, or, at least, what is the issue of my complaints against the manifest violation of the article I have just cited. I beg leave to observe to you that the brevity of the letter of Mr. Lee affords me no satisfaction, and that, if the delay of any length of time in obtaining information, the justice I demand will be too tardy, and will afford the English frigates time to be supplied, and, finally, to brave the authority of your Government.

Accept my esteem.

J. H. Fauchet.

P. S. You will remark, sir, that the letter of the vice consul of Norfolk remained twelve days without an answer; and that, when complaints are made against prizes taken by our cruisers, two hours are enough for even unjust seizures to take place.

Richmond, September 13, 1794.

Sir: I had the honor to find here your letter of the 31st of August; and with very great pleasure will make necessary inquiries, and then pursue the conduct which the President's instructions enjoins.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Henry Lee.

A copy conformable to that which was sent to me by the vice consul of the republic at Norfolk.

J. H. Fauchet.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

Philadelphia, October 9, 1794.

Sir: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 1st instant, in which you are pleased to repeat the complaint contained in your letter of the 18th ultimo, against the English frigate Ternesochrome, carrying into Norfolk, in Virginia, as a prize, the French privateer La Mélisse. You remonstrate also upon the delay which the Governor of Virginia has shown in granting the relief required by the consul of the French republic, and desire to be informed of the instructions which have been given in this affair by the Executive of the United States, or at least of the issue of your application.

It was my intention to have replied to the case of the Ternesochrome, in the answer which I propose to make to your letter of the 18th ult. But I have no hesitation in delivering it to you, as my opinion, that her coming into our ports with a prize is inadmissible by our treaty with France. It is more. It is contrary to the rules which have been long ago prescribed by the President of the United States to the governor of the individual States, and which Governor Lee, in his letter of the 18th ult. to our consul Oster, undertakes to execute.

From the circumstances, however, of Governor Lee being possessed of standing instructions and powers, adequate to his exigency, and Mr. Oster having laid the matter before him, it could not be presumed that he had affected an unnecessary procrastination. Nor did you specify in your letter of the 18th ultimo, the interval between Mr. Oster's application and the retardment of Governor Lee's answer. Hence, it was known to me that it would require some time for a letter to pass from Norfolk to Richmond, the seat of government, for an answer to be returned from Richmond to Norfolk, and for the usual allowance for the possibility of the Governor's absence, (which now seems probable from an expression in his letter of the 19th ult. to Mr. Oster) I did not hold myself justified in expressing to him a suspicion of neglect. Without such a suspicion it would have been absolutely useless to address him, as he could have been merely instructed to make the necessary inquiries, and to fulfill the sense of the President; both which things he ought to accomplish, of course, upon being notified of the occasion.
As Governor Lee, in that letter of the 12th ultimo, promises to discharge the duties which are expected from him, I cannot doubt that he, or the Lieutenant Governor in his absence, has, before this day, completed the business, according to national faith. But that there may not be any impediment to the gratification of your wishes, I have the pleasure of enclosing to you the copy of a letter, which will be despatched by the mail of to-morrow to the Executive of Virginia.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

No. 44.

The Secretary of State to the Lieutenant Governor of Virginia.

Philadelphia, October 2, 1794.

Sir:

It is with great mortification that intelligence has been received at the Department of State, from the minister of the French republic, that the British frigate Terpsichore has carried, as prize, into Norfolk, or some of our ports in its supposed vicinity, the Governor of Montague. Our minister with France has lately forbid the dispatching of a foreign ship of war under such circumstances. The rules which have been adopted by the President are pointed on this particular subject. What is due to all nations, we ought faithfully to render to the British; what is beyond the rights of the law of nations, we are under no obligation to perform, especially towards the British shipping, which is hourly destroying our trade; and more especially in defiance of a treaty which ought to be held sacred.

It appears, sir, by a letter from Governor Lee to the French consul at Norfolk, on the 12th of September last, that he had undertaken to make the necessary inquiries into the fact, and to do what the nature of the case demanded. The minister of the French republic is uneasy at the delay of the Governor's answer, and is led to apprehend, from thence, a more injurious delay in the effecting of the business. I have given him my ideas of the course of this affair, trusting and believing that the patriotism of the Executive of Virginia will not suffer this gross insult to the dignity.

Let me entreat you, sir, to exert the attachment, which I know your whole body to possess, to national faith, and to cause to be rendered to the French republic that justice to which it is entitled, upon the presumption that the facts, as stated, shall be found to be accurate. I have the honor to be, &c.

Philadelphia, the 15th Vendémiaire, (5th October, 1794, O. S.), 3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:

In proportion to the pain of complaining of the negligence and tardiness which are shown in many parts of the United States in the execution of the treaties which equally bind our two nations, is the pleasure of acknowledging the receipt of the despatch in which I found expressed, with the energy of a friend, the intention of the Federal Government to maintain the engagements which it has contracted with the French republic. I observe to you, however, that this intention will produce no effect, if you are obliged to notify it to the Governors every time that hostile vessels, with their prizes, shall enter the ports from their cruise; for these vessels would then have time to take in provisions for themselves and their prizes before the order of departure (which ought to be given to them immediately, for fulfilling the object of the contracting parties) can be notified to them. It does not require a long time to make the researches necessary for determining whether a vessel puts into a harbor only by force of the danger of the sea. This is a case in which a few hours sufficeth for obtaining information; and it appears to me that there is already a fault on the part of the Governors, or of those who are appointed to maintain the laws, that a demand must be made upon them for the execution of the instructions which they have received from their Government. They have failed in their duty, which prescribes a continual vigilance and attention to prevent any thing being done contrary to the laws or treaties of their country.

You will pardon, sir, these reflections, when you shall learn that an English frigate has just anchored in Hampton roads, with two French privateers, as prizes. If, on the very day of her arrival, she has not been directed to depart immediately; if there must have been long inquiries beforehand, and the consul must have written in the first instance, the English will have had time to revictual, and supply all their wants; and the article of our treaty, which, at first sight, seems necessarily to be so disadvantageous to them, will in no respect control their piracies.

To crown the system of robbery which they have invented, nothing more will be wanting than to carry into your ports the vessels which they shall have taken from yourselves; since they already conduct thither, in spite of your laws, those which they have taken from your allies. Accept, sir, my esteem.

Sir:

Although I cannot doubt that the treaties of the United States with France will be respected by your excellency, according to the obligations of good faith and sincere friendship, yet I must take the liberty of recommending to your particular attention the 17th article of the treaty of commerce. Mr. Fauchet, the minister of the French republic near the United States, apprehends, from circumstances which have been experienced, that, unless prompt and decisive measures are adopted, in the several ports, in regard to vessels hostile to the French nation, and bringing in French prizes, this branch of that treaty will become null. It cannot require much time to go through the necessary examinations; and, therefore, I must entreat your excellency to enter into such arrangements for the execution of this member of the treaty, and the correspondent rules of the President of the United States, as will effectually prevent, under those circumstances, hostile vessels receiving comfort and succor, contrary to solemn stipulations. It will not escape your observation that, if adequate measures should be delayed, in the ports distant from your excellency, until you can be notified, and forward special instructions adapted to each case, the opportunity of enforcing the treaty will be lost. RICHMOND, October 10, 1794.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 3d instant. I am not enabled, at present, to give you the information I could wish with respect to the British frigate the Terpsichore. Before the Governor left this place, he received the information which you mention, from the vice consul at Norfolk; and, in his character of commander in chief of the militia, assured Mr. Oster, in a letter of the 12th ultimo, that "he will make the necessary inquiries, and then pursue the conduct which the President’s instructions enjoin." My not receiving any communications respecting the Governor’s inquiries, I naturally concluded the frigate had been ordered to depart, and had complied with the injunction. I have now given the most pointed instructions to the commandant of the militia at Norfolk, to make immediate inquiry into the facts, and report the same to the Executive; and that he, in the mean time, cause to be rendered to the republic of France that justice to which it is entitled. I have written to the vice consul on the subject, and have requested him to make me acquainted with all cases of a similar nature which may hereafter occur. I have the honor, &c.

PHILADELPHIA, the 12th Phidias, (January 31, 1795, O. S.) 3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: It is now the third time that English vessels, notwithstanding my representations, have anchored, with their prizes, in the Chesapeake. I am assured that the French corvette l’Esperance has been conducted into Lyn Haven Bay by the Argonaut. The fact is, that the latter vessel sailed from the Chesapeake in order to capture the corvette belonging to the republic, returned after that expedition, and is even at this moment sheltered there. You assured me, sir, that the most positive orders had been given, to prevent future violations of the treaties; notwithstanding that assurance, the outrage is again renewed, and, what is more, the English vessels, which should remain in your ports only to receive succor strictly necessary to enable them to gain the nearest national port, have remained stationary in them. At their return from a cruise on your coasts, where they capture your own vessels, they procure their provisions, their supplies, in the United States: and may, also, as has just happened, even when driven in by stress of weather, and when asylum is given to them, obstruct your and our commerce. In a word, they appear to be ramps established to cut off all communication between your country and mine. This contravention of the contract which binds our two nations can no longer be tolerated. I expect, sir, your answer, that I may communicate to the French republic the motives for a conduct which will affect it so much the more, as hers is all friendship, all justice, towards the United States.

Accept my respect.

Sir: It is, with the greatest regret that I am constrained to transmit to your excellency the enclosed copy of a letter from the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic. You will find, sir, that it contains most heavy complaints against the indulgence understood to have been shown, in the ports of Virginia, to British vessels of war, which have made prize of French ships. The files of the council of state will support me in representing to the minister, that I had taken the liberty of urging the Executive of Virginia, on the 3d and 10th of October last, to wipe away a similar imputation on our national faith. Not having been enabled to communicate to him any result, in consequence of those letters, I have felt great embarrassment how to answer him on the present occasion. But, sir, confiding in the patriotism of the Executive of Virginia, and being persuaded that it must be painful to them to tolerate the violation of our treaty with France, in so delicate a part, I shall assure him that the most speedy and effectual measures are recommended to your excellency.
Of those measures you are the best judge, being upon the spot, and within the reach of the most accurate information. But I cannot forbear to add, that, as delay must be destructive of the object, it will probably be advisable for your excellency to send down some confidential officer, who may act with promptness and decision, without encountering the inconvenience of being obliged to send and receive express orders to and from Richmond.

And have the honor to be, sir, &c.

No. 54.

The Governor of Virginia to the Secretary of State.

RICHMOND, February 13, 1796.

Sir:

I am extremely concerned that any seeming inattention to the treaty of the United States with France should be attributed to the Executive of Virginia: I, however, flatter myself that an investigation of that subject will totally exculpate them from having, in any instance, authorized an imputation on our national faith.

Although divested of effectual means to prevent, in all our ports, the acts of the citizens or subjects of the belligerent nations, which may contravene an article of the treaty, I trust the enclosed transcripts of the several and repeated letters and instructions on the subject will satisfy the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic, as well as yourself, that the Executive have made every effort to render such instances as few as possible, and on every occasion to remedy them where they have occurred.

Of the act now particularly complained of by Mr. Fauchet, your letter of the 1st instant, with its enclosure, communicated to us the first information; nor will this be a matter of surprise, when the relative situation of Lynnhaven Bay is considered.

The information has now been submitted to the consideration of the Council of State, and that no delay may prevent the application of such remedy as is attainable, and the circumstances of the case may, on further investigation indicate, they have advised that I shall become personally the agent in the business: in consequence of which, I intend to set out to-morrow for Norfolk, and, on my return, or, as soon as the object of my journey is at all effected, you may expect a further communication respecting it.

In the mean time, I must request you will be so obliging as to make Mr. Fauchet acquainted with the step determined on, as well as the contents of the enclosed, and assure him that, independent of their sense of national dignity, and the obligation arising from particular stipulations, the Executive of Virginia will never want inclination to render to the French republic every act of friendship as well as justice, which is compatible with their political situation.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CIRCULAR.

To the Commandants of Counties in which are Ports of Navigation.

RICHMOND, June 8, 1793.

Sir:

The President of the United States having called on me, in my character of commander-in-chief of the militia of this State, to be ready to suppress any attempt or attempts which may be made, within the limits thereof, to violate the neutrality he has declared in behalf of the people of the United States towards the belligerent Powers, I consider it my duty to communicate the same to the commandants of the militia of those counties whose local situation may require it; together with the sentiments expressed by the President on this occasion.

He has declared that the treaty existing between the United States and France, and the treaty existing between the United States and Holland, do not authorize those Powers to arm vessels within our ports; therefore, any attempt on the part of the belligerent Powers, or their subjects, to do so, will be a violation of the neutrality.

In all such cases, you will, therefore, be pleased to interpose with your militia, seizing and detaining any vessel which you may find, within the limits of your county, commissioned, equipped, and manned as a privateer, on behalf of any of the belligerent Powers, or of their subjects; and you will also interpose in all acts of hostility which may happen between the belligerent Powers, detaining the party first aggressing.

In any event of this sort, you will be so good, without loss of time, to communicate the case to me, with all the evidence legally taken in writing, appertaining thereto, that I may transmit the same to the President of the United States, whose decision, when known to me, will be forwarded to you.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

CIRCULAR.

To the Commandants of Counties in which are Ports of Navigation.

RICHMOND, August 22, 1793.

Sir:

It having been decided by the President of the United States that no armed vessel, which has been, or shall be, originally fitted out, in any port of the United States, as a cruiser or privateer, by either of the parties at war, is to have asylum in any of the ports of the United States, in case any vessel within the foregoing description should arrive in any port or harbor within the limits of your county, you are to cause her to be ordered to depart immediately, and in case of her refusal, you are to take effectual measures to oblige her to depart. Force is not to be resorted to, until every proper effort has been previously made to procure the early departure without it. If any such vessel or vessels shall have sent or brought, subsequent to the 5th instant, or should hereafter send or bring any prize or prizes into any port or harbor within your county, you will cause such prize or prizes to be immediately seized by the officers of the United States, for the purpose of being restored to the former owners. The following are the names of the privateers comprehended within the meaning of this letter, that have hitherto come to the knowledge of the Government of the United States:

Citizen Genet, Fitted out at Charleston, S. C.
Sans Culotte, Fitted out at Philadelphia.
Vainqueur de Basile, Fitted out at Philadelphia.
Petit Democrat, fitted out at Philadelphia.

Carmagnole, fitted out at Delaware.

You will be pleased to transmit in writing to the Governor, all the cases, with the evidences thereon, which may occur in pursuance of this communication.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Lieutenant Governor of Virginia to the Vice Consul of the French republic at Norfolk.

RICHMOND, October 9, 1794.

Sir: The communications made by you to the Governor, respecting the British frigate the Terpsichore, he took up as commander-in-chief of the militia, before he left this place; and, I presume, instituted the inquiries which he promised to make in his letter to you of the 13th ult. As the result of those inquiries were not communicated to me, I concluded the British frigate had been ordered to depart, and had done so. I have just now received a letter from the Secretary of State, on the subject of the Terpsichore, and have now given the most pointed instructions to the commander of the Norfolk militia, on the subject of it, and which have been requested by you to communicate to you.

I entreat, sir, that you will be so obliging as to make me acquainted, without loss of time, of all cases of a similar nature which may hereafter occur, and hope that you will be persuaded I shall always feel a particular gratification, on all occasions, to render to the French republic that justice to which it is entitled.

I have the honor to be, &c.

No. 58.

The Lieutenant Governor of Virginia to Thomas Newton, Esq. commandant of the militia of Norfolk.

IN COUNCIL, 9th of October, 1794.

Sir: I have received a letter from the Secretary of State, dated the 3d instant, stating that he had been informed, by the minister of the French republic, that the British frigate the Terpsichore had carried as prize into Norfolk, or some of our ports, the French privateer la Montagne. Our treaty with France positively forbids the admission of a foreign ship of war, under such circumstances. The rules which have been adopted by the President are pointed on this particular subject. Those rules have been communicated to you by the Governor's circular letter of the 5th of December last, to which I beg leave to refer. What is beyond the rights of the law of nations, we are under no obligation to perform, especially towards the British, shipping, which is hourly destroying our trade; and more especially, in defiance of a treaty which will not be held sacred.

I beg, sir, that you will, as commandant of the Norfolk militia, be pleased to inquire into this case, as well as all others of a similar nature, and report the same to the Executive, with all possible dispatch; and that you will, in the mean time, cause to be rendered to the French republic that justice to which it is entitled, upon the presumption that the facts, as stated, shall be found to be accurate. This case was taken up by the Governor, in his character of commander-in-chief of the militia, before he left this place, upon the representation of the vice consul of Norfolk. I find by the Governor's letters to Mr. Oster of the 12th ult. that he assures him, "he will make the necessary inquiries, and then pursue the conduct which the President's instructions enjoin." Not having received any communications respecting the inquiries made by the Governor, I naturally concluded the frigate had been ordered to depart, and had done so.

May I beg the favor of you to communicate the contents of this letter to Mr. Oster, and to Mr. William Lindsay, the collector of the port of Norfolk. I have the honor to be, &c.

The Lieutenant Governor of Virginia to the Commandants of the militia of the borough of Norfolk, and of the counties of Norfolk and Elizabeth City.

IN COUNCIL, 25th October, 1794.

Sir: The minister of the republic of France is apprehensive, from circumstances which have been experienced, that, unless decisive measures are adopted with respect to vessels hostile to the French nation, bringing into our ports, French prizes, the 17th article of the treaty of commerce will become null.

I beg, sir, to call your particular attention to that branch of the treaty, as well as to the correspondent rules of the President of the United States, communicated to you in the Governor's letter of the 5th of December last; trusting that you will pursue measures to prevent, under those circumstances, hostile vessels from receiving comfort or succor, contrary to solemn stipulations.

No. 60.

Lieut. Colonel Willis Wilson to the Governor of Virginia.

PORTSMOUTH, January 3, 1795.

Sir: I beg leave to enclose your excellency a copy of a note from the British consul to the collector of the customs of this port. The collector, it seems, thought himself unwarranted to do any thing in the business. I was applied to by an officer of the customs respecting a consular's request, or demand, and conceived it my duty to give orders to the commandant of the forts not to suffer the frigates to pass until your excellency's orders were had thereon. It is also my duty, for the sake of tranquillity, peace, and order, to make known, that the commanders of this British Majesty's ships have rendered themselves very obnoxious to the citizens of these two towns, as well as others, by lawless depredations on their property, and tyrannical impressments of native seamen; that there now lie at our wharves three French ships of war, with crew to amount of six or seven hundred men, the British ships in question, if allowed to come up, must also lay at the wharves, to go through their repairs; consequently the necessary subordin-tion cannot be had, by the officers of either party, over their seamen; I am, therefore, very apprehensive, in such case, of dangerous consequences. In short, I think it very imprudent in the British to throw themselves in a port where there will be so great a majority of people with whom they are at war; for it is not in the power of the British to keep order, or protect their neutrality; I am sure it is not the case with this. If, therefore, they are entitled to repairs in our ports, I humbly conceive Yorktown, or any other port where there may not be so large a concourse of French citizens, a much more eligible place for them. I will be very thankful to your excellency for advice, whether the brigadiers have an existing command over the respective counties, or whether that command is vested in the lieutenant colonels, and the brigadier generals confined to the brigades?

I have the honor to be, &c.

Sir:

His Majesty's ships Thetis and Cleopatra having received some damage, it will be necessary for them to have repairs before they can again proceed to sea. The Lieutenant Governor of Virginia to Lieutenant Colonel Willis Wilson, Commandant of the Militia of Norfolk county.

In Council, January 7, 1793.

Sir:

The letter which you addressed to the Governor, the 3d instant, has been received by me, and submitted to the consideration of the council of State. The board conceived that ships of war, circumscribed as those mentioned by the British consul, may be permitted to enter our ports, and to make the necessary repairs to fit them for sea; provided they have not made prizes of the subjects, people, or property, of France, and 'coming with their prizes into the ports of the United States.' If any circumstances should occur, which may be subservient of the tranquility of the place, the law gives you ample powers to call forth the militia for the suppression of it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CIRCULAR.

The Secretary of State to the Governors of the several States.

Department of State, April 16, 1793.

Sir:

As it is contrary to the law of nations that any of the belligerent Powers should commit hostility on the waters which are subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, so ought not the ships of war, belonging to any belligerent Power, to take a station in those waters in order to carry on hostile expeditions from thence. I do myself the honor, therefore, of requesting of your excellency, in the name of the President of the United States, that, as often as a fleet, squadron, or ship, of any belligerent nation, shall clearly and unequivocally use the rivers, or other waters of the United States, as a station, in order to carry on hostile expeditions from thence, you will cause them to be notified to the commander thereof, that the President deems such conduct to be contrary to the rights of our neutrality; and that a demand of retribution will be urged upon their Government for prizes which may be made in consequence thereof. A standing order to this effect may probably be advantageously placed in the hands of some confidential officer of the militia; and I must entreat you to instruct him to write by the mail to this Department, immediately upon the happening of any case of the kind.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

No. 63.

Joseph Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

Philadelphia, the 13th Floréal, (May 2, 1795, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:

On the 24th of February last I received the copy of the despatch which the Governor of Virginia transmitted to you. Doubtless your object, as well as his, was to prove the exertions made use of to satisfy the complaints which I have raised against the violation of our treaties, three times repeated in the Chesapeake. I was not a little astonished to see, among the documents you sent me, as a proof of those exertions, the prescription pronounced in 1793 against French vessels armed in the ports of the United States. I do not require this order of the Government to be persuaded of the promptitude with which justice is done to the complaints of English agents.

Since my arrival here, a single allegation from them, whether founded or not, has been sufficient for causing the prizes of our privateers to be arrested, which our treaties sheltered from every kind of prosecution; and, far from using the same coercive means towards the English, when they sent prizes made upon us into your ports, even the severity which your treaties with us impose, has not been exercised towards them. In a word, the militia have, as yet, been assembled only to support the detention of French vessels or of their prizes so that, on a single suspicion, the requisitions of the English have been obeyed, and we, with positive facts, have not been able to obtain justice. I waited the effect of the promises made to you by Mr. Brooke, in his letter of the 19th of February last. After an anxiety of two months, far from receiving the satisfaction which I had a right to expect, I am informed, that a French privateer and two of her prizes have just been carried into Hampton. I hesitated, sir, to testify to you my indignation against this new audacity on the part of the English, at the very moment when their Government is boasting of having become the friend of your country, and that hesitation arose from the little success produced by my reiterated complaints. I once more recall them to you here, sir, and may this be the last time that I shall fulfill that painful duty.

I claimed the execution of our treaties, violated by the putting into Norfolk of ships which captured American and French vessels, laden with provisions, and bound to France, under convoy of the Concord. Far from according to my demand, you took the trouble to interpret the treaty in favor of our enemies, and that unfavorable interpretation tion could not defend a single vessel of the capturing division, since, even in your construction, it had contravened the 17th article of your treaty with France, by taking into Hampton the privateer La Montagne. Hence Governor Lee did not, till after some time, answer the claim of the consul of the republic in Virginia, and contented himself with making some vague promises, of which you yourself, sir, have never yet discovered the effect. Mr. Lee, doubtless, supposed that his promise alone should content and satisfy the just claims of the agents of the French republic, since he has not thought proper to inform his own Government of the measures he was to take for accomplishing his promise given to fulfill the instructions of the President.

Soon after, I had a new opportunity of reiterating to the Executive of the United States my hitherto fruitless complaints against the violation of our treaties: an English vessel, which had put into Hampton, quitted that port on the information of a pilot, in order to go and capture L’Esperance, a corvette of the republic, and an American vessel which appeared in the opening of the bay: she again entered the bay with the corvette; re-armed her there; and sent her out on a cruise. I protested against this surface infraction, and was still answered by promises; and these promises are yet not fulfilled. The Argonaut is also permitted with impunity to defy your magistrates, who doubtless required her to go out, that being their duty. Further: the Thetis, on returning from her piracies against your own vessels, is permitted to repair completely in your ports the considerable damages which she received in the arbor of her pursuit, whilst the 17th article of her treaty is fully opposed to it, as well as to the asylum which you allowed, in general, to Admiral Murray’s division: for, in a word, sir, all the vessels composing this division have taken French and American vessels, under the single pretext that they were laden with French property. Whether the allegation, as to the latter, be true or false, the captors should be driven from your ports. If they be robbed you, one does not receive brigandis in the house they have pillaged. If they have seiz’d our property, our treaty is pointed in that respect.

After so many useless efforts, sir, you must be sensible of the pain I experience in tracing to you a picture, so different from that offered by the French republic, whatever justice towards you is in question, even though the interests are compromised. It was when a terrible war was incessantly devouring her that she rigorously fulfilled her treaties with you; in this instance she demands but justice, and cannot obtain it. On the contrary, she sees her enemies admitted to an intimacy with you at the moment in which your commerce and your sovereignty are alike insulted by them; at the moment when, adding decision to injustice, they despise you anew upon the seas; when they promise to indemnify you for former acts. This reflection, sir, becomes much more grievous when we see posted up under your eyes the official legalisation of a proclamation, which prohibits your commerce with our vessels, and you alone among the nations know, sir, what respect imposes as to what immediately interests your affairs and your relations as a people; but I cannot entirely pass in silence the treaty stipulations, to which the republic is no stranger, because they are directed against her; and that, by subscribe by an excess of courtesy to such orders, were to quit the neutral position which the Americans profess. Examine, I pray you, sir, whether this neutrality can be said to exist, when, on the one hand, you can no longer maintain your treaty; and on the other, you are obliged to abandon your relations exclusively to the discretion of England, who doubtless will soon declare all the universe blockaded, except her possessions. What account do you conceive I can render to the French Government of the means you take for rendering your neutrality respectable? Yet, on that, my instructions insist, and it is on that, more especially, that France is uneasy. I fail not to remind you of the convulsions which I have had the honor of having with you on this subject; still less should I call to your recollection the verbal promises which you have repeatedly made, especially at a certain period of a more honorable state of things, which we entertain the hope you will not have forsaken. All America now knows the result of this measure. The same acts which produced it still exist, since it has taken a form which at first was not announced, but from which, moreover, more had been expected.

I hasten, sir, to quit a subject which I began but with pain, and with respect to which I know my obligations. I return, sir, to the treaty, to which I have more or less been led me more or less by my necessities.

I hope, therefore, sir, that the Executive of the United States will not be satisfied under its treaty concluded with England, since every thing proves that that mean is insufficient. I likewise hope that your ports will henceforward be shut against vessels which enter them in contravention of the treaties uniting our two nations. I also hope, that the President, who has so often promised me through you that he would support the treaties in question, will not order his treaties, upon which I have no shadow of a doubt, be finally fulfilled; in a word, I hope that my claims, so often and so many times repeated, will be attended to, so much the more as they are just, and as for several months I have not ceased to present them to the cold impartiality of your Government.

Accept, sir, &c.

J. H. FAUCHET.

No. 65.

Joseph Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 4th Prairial, (May 23, 1795, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR: It is now twenty-one days since I had the honor of writing to you, and eight since you promised an answer to my letter. It gives me pain to be obliged to remind you of this promise. An event announced in the gazettes proves how much the complaints I have made required an immediate attention. If, against the tenor of the treaties which you have hitherto invoked in vain, an English fleet, employed upwards of ten months at the entrance of your ports, intercepting French property, real or supposed, and even frequently conducting prizes into your bays, had not received a constant asylum in the United States, with the liberty of supplying themselves with provisions and of re-arming their vessels, they could not have endured the exigency which France has been obliged to put upon her resources.

I experience unpleasant sensations, sir, when I observe that such acts are repeatedly repeated on your coasts only as the sequel to the violation of our treaties, notwithstanding my reiterated representations; and notwithstanding the religious punctuality with which the French republic keeps her engagements with a nation to whom she has not ceased to signify her attachment.

Accept, sir, my esteem,

J. H. FAUCHET.

No. 66.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 29, 1795.

SIR: As soon as I had submitted to the President of the United States your letter of the 2d instant, with which I was honored on the 4th, he instructed me to search the files of my office for a negotiation by which, on that occasion, what he has done on every other of a similar nature. This has been to weigh the complaints of foreign ministers with temper and impartiality; to explain misconceptions with frankness; to rectify real errors; to compensate where compensation was due; but to stand firm to the impious dictates of national honor.

I have obeyed his command, with an anxiety to convince the French republic that we have kept pace with our obligations, but with a resolution to resist my reply upon facts, simple and unreserved, and upon seeking, no lustre from a fervency of style. This, sir, is the result.

First. The order of 1793, prohibiting "the original arming and equipping of vessels in the ports of the United States by any of the belligerent parties, for military service, offensive or defensive," was transmitted to you, as a副本, in the first quarter of the present year, and the Government of Great Britain, fully aware of the more remote from my imagination, than that this order could awaken the discontent which generated the early discussions with your predecessor.

It was announced to Mr. Genet in May of that year and its principle has never been since assailed; as far as I remember, without the authorization or permission of the executive. It is, therefore, our purpose to carry the instructions to our minister in Paris on the 16th of August, 1793, which was communicated to the French Executive, assigns to this subject a prominent rank for consideration. Permit me, therefore, to refer you to a letter from this Department to Mr. Genet, on the 5th of June, 1793, wherein you will find the decided sense of the President of the United States, in the act of arming and equipping the grounds of this present nation, with whom they are at peace, is incompatible with the territorial sovereignty of the United States; that it makes them instrumental to the annoyance of these nations; and whereby tends to complicate their position. Permit me also to refer you to an act of Congress on the 5th of June, 1793, on the subject of rovers, or captains, or owners, of any ship or vessel, with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign Prince or State, to cruise or commit hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or properties, of another foreign Prince or State.

To open afresh the disagreeable scenes of that day, is a task which we did not expect, after the disapproval manifested by your republic towards the chief actor; and more especially after the forbearance of the President, who, having no personal impulse to indulge, discovered, as is known, sir, to you, no desire to embrace the opportunity presented of the execution of the order, whatever it may be, in either place, and armed, or knowingly to be concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming, of any ship or vessel, with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign Prince or State, to cruise or commit hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or properties, of another foreign Prince or State.

Both of the above orders for the execution of which, by the President, the order ought to become exceptional to one nation, because, by its operation, "right" is done to another, we still hold it to be reconcilable with unalloyed faith and essential to an honest neutrality.

If French armaments in our ports in any manner violate the provisions of the order, if the execution of it has been prompt; it is because, in the one instance, an expeditious remedy was practicable; and in the other, scarcely any but French cruisers were attempted to be there equipped; although examples are not wanting of British cruisers being in like manner disarmed. Every contrast, therefore, is unfounded between our presumed rapidity of motion and a tardy and questionable execution towards other Powers.

Second. But, sir, you have drawn a conclusion, inadmissible by us, under any aspect. You have ventured to intimate a predilection in our Foreign Office for Great Britain; and to fortify the impression by these suggestions: 1st. That, "ever since you have been here, single allegations have been made by your privateers, although our treaties should shelter them from every pursuit." 2d. That, "far from using the same means of coercion towards the English, when they send into our ports the prizes made from the high seas, the rigorous treatment and manner of justice which our treaties demand, has not been exercised." 3d. That, "the prize list as yet has not been published only in the case of a few vessels," 4th. That, "under our eyes is fixed the official legalization of a proclamation, which interdicts to us a commerce with your colonies, and suspends as to us alone the law of nations." 5th. And "that the United States quit, the neutrality which they profess, by subscribing, through an excess of circumspection, (menagement) a mandate like this and by being unable, on the one side, to maintain their treaties, and by being obliged, on the other, to abandon their relations exclusively to the discretion of England." You lastly allude to our treaty with Great Britain, as if it ritually the suspensions, so profusely strobed in every page of your letter.

First. If the names of the French prizes, which have been arrested by virtue of instructions from our Government, are the time and place of the arrest, and the issue of the examination, were now within my reach, each of them would be sent to the test. But, not being individually remembered, they shall be classed under three heads: 1st. Those made by illegal privateers: 2d. Those made by lawful cruisers, but within the protecting line of our coast and its islands: 3d. Those made by lawful cruisers in the high seas.

1st. The seizure of prizes, made by illegal privateers, was the effect of necessity; having been postponed until the injunctions against those corsairs had been often and flagrantly contumaciously. No precaution was spared to prevent an unjust detention. The Executive of the United States, the Governors, or some officer acting under the one or the other, passed their judgment upon the probability and necessity of the cause of arrest, in the first stage of the business, and the final decision was always dispassionate and deliberate what better security, situated as our country is, could have been devised, to avoid oppression on one hand, and to discharge our neutral functions on the other.

Although little would be hazarded by asserting that few, if any, of those seizures were exempt from the animadversion of the Executive rules, in 1793, and it would be a laborious undertaking to discuss them in all their minutiae, yet will not that undertaking be declined, whenever it shall be desired, and a bill shall be produced. We are aware that the privateers, that the whole of the commerce of privateers is prohibited, and that they are not allowed by us, and that it would be difficult to fix the preponderance of either scale. By imposing on the claimant, according to strict law, the burden of maintaining his own pretensions, and by repudiating testimony which was exceptable, not from a defect of character in the witness, but from a critical application of judicial maxims, the captors retained their prize. Nor did we stop here; the damages incurred by the seizure, should be payable by the rulers of the merchant ships on the ocean. It would be replied, that such a discouragement is distant from their wishes but of the greater consideration, of disinclining the trade of their enemy, overwhelms the consequential embarrassment to that of others.

3d. As to prizes, made by legal cruisers on the high seas, it never was the intention of the President to interfere, he having abstained (as the seventeenth article of our treaty of commerce imports) from examining into their laws and instructions. Nor can any express or implied, however ingenious may be ascribed any vocation of genuine prizes, they may, perhaps, have been mistaken for prizes of the two foregoing ominous kinds. But even for these mistakes we ought not to be questioned, until they shall have been notified to us, and satisfaction has been refused. Finally, we are aware that your judicial authorities may be as arbitrary as yourselves, if it be; nor do we pretend to control their operations. Some justice is needed to this argument; others repelled it. But it has been since maturely settled by the supreme court of the United States, that relief ought to be administered, where it is bona fide prey. If it were otherwise, the substance of our citizens would be the sport and plunder of every sea rover who carried a French commission in his pocket. The treaty shudders prizes from an enemy, not reciprocally from our own citizens, or from other neutral people. Further than to rescue captures of this denomination, it is not considered that our courts are competent.
There was, indeed, once, room to fear that claimants sometimes embraced the double chance of executive and judicial redress. But the promises which Congress made in this manoeuvre was counteracted by my letter to you, and the act of the 25th of August, 1791.

Second. Your next impulsion is, that, "far from using the same means of coercion towards the English, when they send into our ports prizes made from the French, the rigor which our treaties demand has not been exercised."

The authority of the signature quoted for this evidence, which had captured American and French bottoms, laden with provision for France, under the convoy of the Concorde; and in the squadron of Admiral Murray putting into the harbor of Norfolk, and enjoying asylum therein: 2d, In the British frigate Terpsichore coming into Hampton with the prize they had taken from the Argonaut. 3d. In another dispatch, having no business with the ports, upon the advice of a French privateer, they sent out a vessel, to attack L'Esperance, a corvette of the French republic, and an American vessel, both of which were discovered at the opening of the bay; returning with the corvette into the Chesapeake re-arming her, sending her out to cruise; and, thirdly, in the same dispatch, declaring that the British government has decided to return the vessels of our pirates on our own vessels, to repair completely, in our ports, the heavy damage she had sustained in the ardeor of pursuit.

1st. Under our treaty with France, opposes the granting of access to the public armed vessels of the nations with whom we may be at peace, custom has established that they may enter our ports, impelled by necessity, or induced by comfort or convenience. This was announced by the Executive on the 9th of September, 1793.

Notwithstanding that treaty, it has not yet been disputed that the same allowance may be extended to the enemies of the United States to the French property or people. But, on the 8th of August, 1793, the President declared his construction of that treaty to be, that no public armed vessels were thereby forbidden from our waters, except those which should have made prize of the people or property of France, coming with their prizes, although, when you allude to my letter of the 7th of September, 1794, which was occasioned by yours of the 21st of August, 1794, and drew forth a reply on the 18th of September, 1794, you insinuated that "pains have been taken by me to interpret the treaty in favor of your enemies;" yet, was it an interpretation advised by all the heads of departments, and the attorney general, with whom the President was in the habit of consulting? You differ from us in the construction. What is to follow? Nothing, I trust and believe, between our two Governments, which is not customary and cordial between friends.

"In a case like the present, where the mission of one Government construes differently from that to which he is sent, the treaties, which are to form a common rule of action for both, it would be unjust in either to claim an exclusive right of construction. Each nation has an equal right to expound the treaty, according to its own constructions, and such constructions will be justly understood by the other party. It is the right and duty of the foreign missionary to urge his own constructions; to support them with reasons which may convince, and in terms of decency and respect, which may reconcile the Government of the country to a concurrence. It is the duty of that Government to listen to his reasonings with attention; and if it shall think fit to construe the treaty in the light which is thrown on it by one of its subjects, on their side, it follows, of necessity, that, exercising the sovereign powers of the country, they have a right to proceed on their own constructions and conclusions, as to whatever is to be done within their limits. The minister then reverts to the case to his own Government; asks new instructions, and, in the meantime, acquiesces in the authority of the country. His Government examines his constructions; abandons them, if wrong, insists on them, if right; and the case then becomes a matter of negotiation between the two nations.

This quotation is from the letter which conveyed to the French republic the sensations of our Government towards Mr. Genet. To its terms we shall be bound to adhere, if, contrary to our present impressions, the treaty with France, which we do so much consider, shall appear to your republic to require the expulsion of every British ship of war, which may have taken a French prize in any part of the world, let us be convinced, and we will renounce the ancient opinion, and fulfil whatever we have a right to do.

Thus thinking, we could not banish that part of Admiral Murray's squadron, which had not come in with French prizes. But if they have used the waters of the United States as a station, from whence to carry on hostile expeditions, they will fall within the animadversions of the President's order on the 16th ultimo; and when the facts shall be ascertained, he will not be backward in supporting his declarations.

Second. The British frigate Terpsichore is considered by you as offending our own interpretation of the treaty, and being nevertheless tolerated in our ports. We will, therefore, trace the transactions concerning her to their origin.

On the 18th of September, 1794, you represented to me, in a letter received on the 20th, that "she had cast anchor at Norfolk with the French privateer La Montagne, which she had taken; that the consul of the French republic had written to the Governor of Virginia to complain of this infraction, and a long time had elapsed without reply. Since the 2d of October, she had been informed that your letter, dated on the 18th of September, to the letter of the French consul, saying that "he would with very great pleasure make the necessary inquiries, and then pursue the conduct which the President's instructions enjoined." At the same time you requested to know the instructions of the President to the Governor, or at least the issue of your representations."

The dispatch of the 17th ultimo contains the letter to the Governor, and the answer from him, which is a copy of your letter, with the observations of the President, and the instructions that shall have been transmitted to the Governor in answer to your letter of the 18th ultimo. But I have no hesitation in delivering it to you, as my opinion, that her coming into our ports with a prize, is inadmissible by our treaty with France. It is more. It is contrary to the rules which have been long ago prescribed by the President of the United States, to the Governors of the individual States, and with Governor Lee, in his letter of the 12th ultimo, to consul Oster, undertakes to execute.

"From the circumstances, however, of Governor Lee being possessed of standing instructions and powers, adequate to the exigency, and of Mr. Oster having laid the matter before him, it could not be presumed that he had need of the President's personal instructions. You specify in your letter, that you have received Mr. Oster's application and the retardment of Governor Lee's answer. Hence, as it was known to me that it would require some time for a letter to pass from Norfolk to Richmond, the seat of government, for an answer to be returned from Richmond to Norfolk, and for the usual allowance for the possibility of the Governor's absence, I thought it expedient to address another to Mr. Oster, in order to be more prompt in the matter, and to justify him in expressing to him a suspicion of neglect. Without such a suspicion, it would have been absolutely useless to address him, as he could have been merely instructed to make the necessary inquiries, and to fulfil the sense of the President, both which things he ought to accomplish of course, upon being notified of the case. As Governor Lee, in that letter of the 19th ultimo, promises to discharge the duties which are expected from him, I cannot doubt that he, or the Lieutenant Governor, in his absence, has before this day completed the business, according to national faith. But, that there may not be any impediment to the gratification of your wishes, I have the pleasure of sending you the copy of a letter, which will be dispatched by the mail of to-morrow to the Executive of Virginia."

That letter runs thus: "October 3d, 1794. It is with great mortification that intelligence has been received at the Department of State from the minister of the French republic, that the British frigate Terpsichore has carried off from the Norfolk coast, the ship Montagne, one of the prizes of our squadron, which had captured American and French bottoms, laden with provision for France, under the convoy of the Concorde; and in the squadron of Admiral Murray putting into the harbor of Norfolk, and enjoying asylum therein: 2d, In the British frigate Terpsichore coming into Hampton with the prize they had taken from the Argonaut. 3d. In another dispatch, having no business with the ports, upon the advice of a French privateer, they sent out a vessel, to attack L'Esperance, a corvette of the French republic, and an American vessel, both of which were discovered at the opening of the bay; returning with the corvette into the Chesapeake re-arming her, sending her out to cruise; and, third, in the same dispatch, declaring that the British government has decided to return the vessels of our pirates on our own vessels, to repair completely, in our ports, the heavy damage she had sustained in the ardor of pursuit.

It appears, sir, by a letter from Governor Lee to the French consul at Norfolk, on the 12th of September last, that he had undertaken to make the necessary inquiries into the fact, and to do what the nature of the case demanded..."
ed. The minister of the French republic is uneasy at the delay of the Governor's answer, and is led to apprehend from the circumstances of the case that his government may be about to recede as to that point of the treaty which, you will observe, is the principal article, trusting and believing that the patriotism of the Executive of Virginia will not suffer this gross insult to our treaty.

Let me entreat you, sir, to exert the attachment, which I know your whole body to possess, to national faith, and to cause to be rendered to the French republic that justice to which it is entitled, upon the presumption that our government will not fail to do it, in justice and honor.

Upon these letters you were pleased, on the 6th of October, 1794, to make the following comments: "In proportion to the pain of complaining of the negligence and tardiness which are shown in many parts of the United States in complying with the treaty, the same indolence or even negligence has, I am told, been exhibited in the receipt of the despatch, in which I find expressed, with the energy of a friend, the intention of the Federal Government to maintain the engagements which it has contracted with the French republic. I observe to you, however, that this intention will produce no effect, if you are obliged to notify to the Governors every time that hostile vessels are discovered in their ports, to give them time to take in provisions for themselves and their prizes before the order of departure, which ought to be given to them immediately, for fulfilling the object of the contracting parties, can be notified to them. It does not require a long time to make these researches necessary to determine the precise period in which these prizes may be taken, by force of the dangers of execution. This is a work in which a few weeks sufficic for obtaining information, and it appears to me that there is already a fault on the part of the Governors, or of those who are appointed to maintain the laws, that a demand must be made upon them for the execution of the instructions which they have received from their Government. They have filled you, in that, which prescribes a continual vigilance and attention, to prevent such being done, contrary to the laws or treaties of your country. You will pardon, sir, these reflections, when you shall learn that an English frigate has just anchored in Hampton Roads with two French privates, as prizes. If, on the very day of her arrival, she has not been directed to depart immediately; if there must have been long inquiries beforehand, and the counsel must have written in the first instance, the English will have had time to revictual, and supply all their wants; and the article of our treaty, which at first sight seems necessary to be so disadvantageous to them, will in no respect control their piracies. To crown the system of robbery which they have invented, nothing more remains but to carry their prey, or to carry the ports for them themselves; since they already conduct thither, in spite of your laws, those which they have taken from your allies."

That your suggestion was not forgotten is demonstrated by my circular letter to the Governors on the 10th of October, 1794, a copy of which I had the honor of enclosing to you on the same day, in these words: "Although I cannot, sir, at present express the sentiments of the United States with regard to the connection of the obligations of good faith and sincere friendship, but yet I must take the liberty of recommending to your particular attention the 17th article of the treaty of commerce. Mr. Fauchet, the minister of the French republic near the United States, appointed, from the circumstances which have occurred, to keep an eye on the measures which are now adopted in the several ports, in regard to vessels hostile to the French nation, and bringing in French vessels, this branch of that treaty will become null. It cannot require much time to go through the necessary examinations; and, therefore, I must entreat your excellency to enter into such arrangements for the execution of this member of the treaty, and the correspondent rules of the President of the United States, as will effectively prevent, under those circumstances, hostile vessels from receiving comfort and succor, contrary to solemn stipulations. It will not escape your observation, that, if adequate measures should be delayed, in the ports distant from your excellence, until you can be notified, and forward special instructions adapted to each case, the opportunity of enforcing the treaty will be lost."

On the 10th of October, the Lieutenant Governor of Virginia acknowledges the receipt of mine of the 3d, and proceeds: "That he was not able at present to give me the information he could wish, with respect to the British insurrections, before the 4th of this month, he ascribed the delay to an engagement with the vice consol at Norfolk, and, in his character of commandant-in-chief of the militia, assured Mr. Oster, in a letter of the 19th ultimo, that he would make the necessary inquiries, and then pursue the conduct which the President's instructions enjoined, that, not receiving any communications respecting the Governor's inquiries, he naturally concluded that the frigate had been ordered to depart, and had complied with the injunction; that he had now given the most pointed instructions to the commandant of the militia at Norfolk to make immediate inquiry into the facts, and report the same to the Executive; and, in the mean time, to cause to be rendered to the republic of France that justice to which it was entitled; that he had written to the vice consol on the subject, and he requested him to make the Lieutenant Governor acquainted with all cases of a similar nature, which might thereafter occur." A copy of this letter I had the honor of transmitting to you on the 19th of October, 1794.

The Lieutenant Governor had given, on the 9th of October, 1794, positive instructions to the purport promised, as in a letter of the 5th, which Mr. Thomas Norcom had been, on the 29th of the same month, directed the commandant of the militia of Norfolk, and the counties of Norfolk and Elizabeth City, effectually to execute my letter of the 10th of October, 1794, by preventing vessels in the predicament described from receiving comfort or succor. Is it not asked? Lieutenant Governor Wood truly conjectured that she had departed. For she sailed, certainly, before the 28th of September, 1794, and, very probably, about the 30th, and it is not understood that she has returned.

But in the fragmentation of facts, will you find a vestige of British prepossession? Is it in the interpretation which we have given to the 17th article of the treaty? We are still persuaded of its soundness. Until we be convinced of an error, bound, as we are, by the law of nations, to sit as an independent umpire between the pretensions of the belligerent parties, relative to ourselves, we are bound by conscience to obey our own understandings. Is it in the Federal Executive not having employed the most effectual means in his power? He was bound to consult with the Governors, the district attorneys, the collectors of the customs, and he appointed the militia for important exigencies.

Is it because our nation, as yet far below the zenith of its future force, cannot summon into action a navy whereby to give effect to the intrusions? This would be extravagance. Is it because we do not learn, in our notoriety, that the French have already conducted thither, in spite of your laws, those which they have taken from your allies?"

The 31st of January, 1795, was the earliest notice of the event to the President of the United States. "Mr. H. Smith, of the 2d of February, transmitting yours, was the earliest notice to the Executive of Virginia. That, in the whole, the British government appears to have been the source of accusation, as he conceived, when he resorted to the vice consol of the French republic, residing there. But, says the Governor, on the 1st of April, 1795, "With respect to the capture of the corvette, I received no information from him which appeared to the importance of the vessel, or the event, to be worthy of his notice, but rather seemed to consider the introduction of the prisoners, made on that occasion, so soon, into the place where the exchange would be effected, as an alleviation of the misfortune of losing the vessel, which he attributed to some misinformation received by the captain from two American vessels, with the names of which, or of their masters, he was unacquainted."
Here, without censure, might the Governor have abandoned his investigation; but being no lukewarm pursuer of truth, he proceeded further. — "Being informed that a pilot from Norfolk (a man of respectable character) was well acquainted with the circumstances of the capture, and his absence preventing the Governor from then availing himself of his information, and also because, as we have before stated, he had heard, though with a good degree of confidence, of the death of the Blockade, at the time of her capture, and transmitted to him an expectation of which documents prevented him from recurring to the subject sooner."

Mr. Daniel Bedinger, who seems to have been charged with the obtaining of this rumor, wrote to the Governor on the 22d inst. (a copy of the letter is here inserted by your request, when I last had the pleasure of seeing him), in which begins a verbal account of the case, to the conclusion that Mr. Cowper and myself called upon the captain of the French corvette taken off the coast last January, and requested him a statement of the circumstances relative to his being captured. He first appeared willing to comply with our wishes, and was so far disposed to it the next day for the purpose of executing the same, as to appear, He was afterwards informed that he had been applied to, severally, by Mr. Cowper and myself, when he discovered a degree of scruple, for which we could not readily account, observing, at the same time, that he had, immediately on his arrival at this place, (Norfolk) rendered to the French consul a full and circumstantial account of that transaction."

The counter declaration is not offered as a paper to which much confidence is due; but, suspicious as it is, it advised us to pause, before the Government was complicated upon Butler's single affidavit. I have therefore enforced the Executive of Virginia to remove all ambiguity. Mr. Bedinger has been aware of Butler's recantation; but as he had not seen it, the certificates which were forwarded from him by the Governor of that State, have, perhaps, been rejected, in which case they will be submitted for the approval of the Senate. This is the sum of every syllable which we know concerning the\'P esperse. The train in which the subject now rests, is, in the opinion of the President, the most eligible one. The facts will be explored with all the expedition in our power, and if discovered to be the early of old rumors, which is very probable."

Fourth. You will correct me, sir, if I err when I suppose that you build your complaint of the repairs of the Thetis upon the despatches of the Governor of Virginia, which I had the honor of enclosing to you on the 28th of February last. Being unanswerable of any other statement, I shall direct my reply to that which is disclosed by those papers. The British Consul Hamilton, informed the collector at Norfolk, on the 2d of January, 1795, that the "Thetis and Cleopatra having received some damage, it would be necessary for them to have repairs, before they could again proceed to sea: that they were both expected there the first fair wind, for that purpose, and, he presumed, the Admiralty would pass the forts into that harbor."

The collector thinking himself unwarranted to do any thing in the business, the lieutenant colonel of the militia of Norfolk was applied to, who was to convey his duty to give orders to the commandant of the forts, not to suffer the frigates to pass, until the Governor's orders should be had thereon. The Executive of Virginia resolved that "ships of war, circumstanced as those mentioned in said commodious ports to be taken up, that it order to go on board of the people or property of France, and come in with their prizes in the ports of the United States." Not being prohibited, by the laws of neutrality or the treaty, from permitting in our ports to any of the belligerent parties vessels like the Thetis and Cleopatra, 3d, 1796, declared that "equipment in the ports of the United States, of vessels of war, in the immediate service of Government of any kind, its duties, which, if done to other vessels, would be of a doubtful nature, as being applicable either to commerce or war, are deemed lawful except those which shall have been made prize of the subjects, people, or property of France, coming with the ports of the United States, pursuant to the 17th article of the treaty of amity and commerce with France."

This is the kind of repairs done to the Thetis, I am, as yet, an absolute stranger. That they were not warlike, is rather probable from the expressions of the Virginia Executive. That they were not warlike, is more probable still, from their acquiescence. Every report accorded with these conjectures. But, notwithstanding this strong appearance that the rules have not been violated, an inquiry has been instituted.

Third. The third symptom of a British predilection is conceived to be, "That the militia have, as yet, been assembled in the different ports and their prisoners and officers, sir, commanded, to demonstrate their dispositions: either that they have not been designated by the standing instructions to the officers in the States, to be proper to employ in favor of the French on those conjunctures in which the militia would be the appropriate instruments, or that there has been no direction to employ them."

Our constitution, laws, and distribution into several independent States, naturally marked out the Governors, as the condutors of the Federal Government in maintaining our neutrality. Their quality of commanders-in-chief of the militia was particularly selected, when they were desired to co-operate, and the militia was pointed out as the resources of the country.

If it has happened that, from negligence or design, France has been indisposed in succor from the militia when it ought to have been displayed, specify the instances, sir, they shall be immediately analyzed. In the mean time, permit me to observe, that it would have been not a little extraordinary to refuse the aid of the militia to one belligerent without justly sooner demanding it, merely because the same or a like case had not occurred, and might not occur, in regard to another.

Fourth. The predicament of a neutral nation is always peculiar and delicate; and eminently so, while it defends itself against a stronger Power. Lord North, Powers, in the misgivings of another. But you are not to infer from my justification of the Executive, that the validity of the proclamation of blockade is asserted. We did read, on the 1oth of April, 1795, a publication from His Britannic Majesty's consul general for the Middle and Southern States of America, giving public notice that he had received official communications that the islands of Guadaloupe, Marigalante, and Desirade, were, by proclamation, issued by His Britannic Majesty's general and vice admiral, commanding in the West Indies, declared to be in an actual state of blockade, and that neutral vessels were, by that proclamation, prohibited from attempting to enter any of the ports or places of the said islands, with provisions or supplies of any nature or kind whatsoever, under the penalty of being denied the free and peaceable enjoyment of the said trade, and of making no sale of any kind whatever, the West India trade always was, that this excision was often resorted to in the mind of the Executive. It was acknowledged that neutrals are interdicted by the law of nations from a blockaded port. From some quarter or other, the blockade must be notified, or else neutrals would be a constant, unsuspecting prey, not being in a condition to know whether a war was actually, or only seemingly, in progress. Surely not the besieged, but the besiegers, whether we consult principle or practice. The check which neutrals have upon a wanton and false parade of a siege, is the same with the check upon any other groundless pretence. We might, indeed, have, after all, put as much confidence by the conduct of nations as was shown in the document upon which the resending of that edict could have been urged. If rumour were a fit guide, who can pronounce on which side rumor preponderated, when stripped of the exaggerations which a host of passions had gathered together? We had, it may be said, one effort remaining, which was to pronounce to the citizens of the United States, that the proclamation was not a war, and we add to them. If, after this declaration of that act, any American vessel had risked, and incurred confiscation, the Government would have been importuned for something more than the general protection, which is the birthright of all our citizens. The clamor would have been for a special indemnity; and under such a cloak, frauds innumerable and more or less apparent, might have covered our own acts. So much is it part of our nature that we have no mind to be unkind to ourselves. We are as much at liberty to controvert the existence of the blockade, as we were when it was ushered into the world through the newspaper. If conveniences have arisen to the French republic by an interruption of our commerce with those islands, let them be ascribed to the actual position of our affairs. It may, however, be remarked, that the Executive have not been unmindful of arrangements which might soften the severity of the laws of blockade.

Fifth. The first part of your fifth allegation, which implies "that the United States quit the neutrality which they profess, by subscribing, through an excess of circumstances, (management) to an order like the proclamation, has been just anticipated. To the second part, which asserts that we also quit the neutrality which we profess, by being unable to maintain our treaties, we answer that, although, to the best of our ability and understanding, we have maintained our treaties, yet, if any occasional or real disability has been shown, this cannot be transformed into a renunciation of neutrality. "There is a difference between a temporary suspension of the force of the treaty, and a renunciation of it or a renunciation of the right to a full and complete execution of it by force. To them, we may say that, it has been renounced by the infamy and situation of our Government; that it could have been remedied by any expeditious order at our command, except sur reprise, or the forerunners of both; and, then, and not till then, will it be incumbent upon us so to account for it further. " That we have been obliged to abandon our relations exclusively to England," (as in the third place you have affirmed) is a question of fact between us. We declare the America navy cannot yet dispute the ocean; but American rights have not been relinquished. Of the time, mode, and style, of enforcing them, the United States are the sole judge.

Sixth. Throughout your letter, you have observed allusions to the late treaty of the United States with Great Britain for the admission of their ships into a port of our own. The transactions of your observations has tended, and we are taught, from one passage to another, to view it as a prelude to representations which you meditate to the French republic.

That treaty has been communicated from the Department of State only to the chief magistrate of the United States. But it will not be conceived that reasons peculiar to the case caused this reserve, nor that it extends towards foreign nations which should lead us to infringe the usage of suspending the publication of treaties, until the ratifications have been exchanged, or to impart to them more than has already been imparted to the committee of public safety in France, by our envoy in London, through our minister in Paris. Yes, sir, you say that you demand justice only; justice you shall have, for the sake of the rights of commerce, which is an article of the first magnitude, and for which I say, that I have offered to have made, you that our treaties with France shall be sacred. No nation upon earth can control our will, unless preceding engagements be violated. To save the rights of the French republic was an ultimatum in the instructions to our envoy; the American envoy is, as far as our convenience extends, and which is in our power, to strictly observe the same. The President is willing to supercede all orders which can, with propriety, be expected from him, for the execution of our treaties with France, if they can be suggested to him accordingly. Every engagement which can be brought against the Government, we shall meet at the proper season, and in the armor of political integrity. We confide that the wisdom and magnanimity of the French republic, which resisted past machinations to disturb our harmony, will receive, with caution, suspicion which may be hereafter thrown on our fidelity. For her happiness we pray, and may our connexion be perpetual.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

No. 67.

Joseph Rachelet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, the 9th Prorial, (June 8, 1795.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: Your letter of the 29th of May was received by me on the 2d instant. The different subjects therein discussed meritting the most serious consideration, I have taken some time to prepare an answer, which I shall now give with all the candor the subject requires.

In the first place, I shall observe, sir, that, in writing my letter of the 2d of May, in consequence of a crowd of complaints which were brought to me, I had not proposed to myself a plan so extensive as that you have pursued in your despatch. It is observed that, in order to give a notice for the conduct of the Executive in every case, I have myself to have offered to you, that our treaties with France shall be sacred. No nation upon earth can control our will, unless preceding engagements be violated. To save the rights of the French republic was an ultimatum in the instructions to our envoy; the American envoy is, as far as our convenience extends, and which is in our power, to strictly observe the same. The President is willing to supercede all orders which can, with propriety, be expected from him, for the execution of our treaties with France, if they can be suggested to him accordingly. Every engagement which can be brought against the Government, we shall meet at the proper season, and in the armor of political integrity. We confide that the wisdom and magnanimity of the French republic, which resisted past machinations to disturb our harmony, will receive, with caution, suspicion which may be hereafter thrown on our fidelity. For her happiness we pray, and may our connexion be perpetual.

I have the honor to be, &c.
denomination, and you take the trouble to establish that they have a right to intervene in every case that can be brought under those heads. In the first place, sir, I never have, at least to my recollection, contested the right of your courts or of the Government to interfere in matters of the nature of those you mention. But I have complained of the inconvenience which arises from those (two of which, I believe, belong to them). I might, therefore, in answer to your request, cite to you a great number of affairs, of the kind to which you allude, and will be easy more at leisure to support them from the different consulates. I could, for example, bring, on the topic the affair of citizen Tulibot, which is not yet determined, and in which your courts contest a prize, upon the validity of a commission given by the French Government. It is, as I believe, a case, as I have said, which is well known to you.

They support themselves in this circumstance with the treaty which the United States have with Holland, when that very treaty gives to us the privileges of the 17th article of ours: and I could cite, in proof of the facilities which it contains for the same, that a prize does not belong to them, the affair of the vessel called the Cleopatra of Marseille. This privateer, armed and commissioned at the Cape, served there for the French Government, and, having sailed from thence, had just sent prizes into New York and Charleston. In the former part her prizes had been sold without opposition, and in the latter they have been seized and judged illegal. With these I conclude. As a natural corollary to the question, if the French have not been subjected to those vexations, and that one of the most unpleasant parts of my functions has been to answer the just claims of my injured countrymen. I could have wished that the Government had taken decisive measures, as well to prevent unjust chicaneries, as to maintain its regulations on the armaments, or augmentation of armaments, in the manner agreed in the Treaty of 1783. If the former was far was done in the Treaty of 1783; the latter, the General Government, had the power of deciding cases of capture within the limits of the United States, and, in the interim, the contested prizes remained in the hands of the consuls. These regulations appear to have been conceived to annoy the tropics, in my opinion, agreement with my predecessor on the 29th June, 1799. Measures for terminating the examinations in a summary manner, by voluntary arbitrations between the parties, were afterwards instituted, or by the cross-examination of contradictory witnesses, upon which the Government of the United States were to judge. These were communicated in November, 1799. It were to be wished that these proceedings had been extended to the cases of prizes legally made by vessels duly commissioned, and contested at all hazards by our enemies before your tribunals. I have since proposed to you as an additional measure for expediting these affairs to subject the proprietors to furnish security for the damages occasioned by their suits. My proposition was that the British enemies had a right of choice of conforming to them, or of returning to the courts, prefer the latter, in which they have the advantage of finding some circumstances in which it was impossible that your courts would not grant protection to your fellow citizens who claim it, unless you add, it is wished that the lives and property of our citizens should become the sport and prey of the first sea rover. There is no doubt on this head. But, if any fortuitous events of this nature have taken place, I should be the first to take notice of them. I do not deny prizes, and I see with regret that all the armed vessels of my nation which bring prizes into the United States suffer under such a bitter, and, I also add, such an ill-founded reflection. If sea rovers exist, who systematically attack the property of your fellow citizens, it is not certainly among the French mariners. I doubt whether you can reproach us of another case, similar to that in which the Concordo's enemy was permitted to seize her, and yet didn't receive a prize. And I know that satisfaction was not evinced in an equivalent manner; and I believe that, in many stronger cases than that, the United States have been far from obtaining from any other quarter so decisive and so sincere an act of justice. On touching upon the armed vessels which I conceive it my duty so make some parts of your letter, I, in two words, return to its commencement. You remind me of anes long passed, the energetic measures which you have taken, and the patience and generosity of the Government under those circumstances. I cannot believe that you wish to establish similitudes between the present and the past. Were I, for a moment, to admit it, I should remind you of the proclamation which I published on my arrival; and I should then content myself with requesting you to cite the cases in which I have authorized, in which I have permitted, contraventions of the laws of the United States, and of the regulations of the President, in the first instance, and afterwards of my engagements.

I presume you will not object that all asphyxia should be refused (except in cases of distress or of tempest) to the English vessels who shall have made prize of French vessels, or of French property. Under this persuasion it was that I early complained against the admission of every English vessel of that denomination; it was this persuasion which induced me to write my letter of the 18th September, in answer to yours of the 17th of the same month, in which I found a construction of the treaty which I have appealed to. I admit, however, that you had notified me, in your letter of 20th August, preceding the regulations of the President of the United States establishing it; but I was so far from suspecting this article, that I did not, in reading it, observe it. These regulations of the President, by the way, did not appear to me, which leads me to believe that they were never notified to me before the 20th August last. If no complaint has ever been made on this subject, it must be evident, that the English vessel, which is not mine, was allowed to remain by the president; and I wish to know if you object to the same article of the treaty, and in contempt of all neutrality, after having made French prizes, and pillaged your vessels under the simple pretext of trading with France.

The 17th article of our treaty, sir, do not object that all asphyxia should be refused (except in cases of distress or of tempest) to the English vessels who shall have made prize of French vessels, or French property. Under this persuasion it was that I early complained against the admission of every English vessel of that denomination; it was this persuasion which induced me to write my letter of the 18th September, in answer to yours of the 17th of the same month, in which I found a construction of the treaty which I have appealed to. I admit, however, that you had notified me, in your letter of 20th August, preceding the regulations of the President of the United States establishing it; but I was so far from suspecting this article, that I did not, in reading it, observe it. These regulations of the President, by the way, did not appear to me, which leads me to believe that they were never notified to me before the 20th August last. If no complaint has ever been made on this subject, it must be evident, that the English vessel, which is not mine, was allowed to remain by the president; and I wish to know if you object to the same article of the treaty, and in contempt of all neutrality, after having made French prizes, and pillaged your vessels under the simple pretext of trading with France.

On analysing all my complaints upon this part of the treaty, they are reduced to the entry of English vessels which have made prize of French prizes, and to the admission of their prizes alone. There never has been any hesitation on this point. There never has been a case, as far as I am aware, of which part of what I have written is built, I avail, according to your construction, upon a false basis. But, even admitting that construction, the Terpsichore should not have been admitted at Norfolk, with the privateer la Montagne, whose part of the Trois Freres was not at this time in existence, nor have equipped the latter in your waters. On the first point, you remind me of all the Federal Executive, and of my own letters, in which I have expressed my satisfaction. But, sir, if I could not but be satisfied, at that time, at the propriety of the course you pursued, I must, at this moment, reflect, I pray you, whether I have equally had reason to be satisfied, or whether you have been governed by the opinions which you have entertained from the time at which you first became responsible for the running of your Government, or perhaps the opinions which you have entertained from the time you first became responsible for the running of your Government, or perhaps the Government. The French consul at Norfolk, on the 31st August, wrote to request the expulsion of the frigate Terpsichore, and of her prize the privateer la Montagne. Governor Lee, after a lapse of twelve days, answered him. He an-sweared, on the 19th of September, that he was going to make inquiry. It appears that the inquiry was not made for, on the 29th of September, two other English frigates entered Hampton Roads, with two prizes made upon us, and the same day the vice consul sent a new complaint to the Executive of Virginia. The inquiries of Governor Lee could not have been very extensive, nor have been made in such haste, for it would seem, that if, on replying on the 13th, they had been made as the vice consul was instructed to write at that time, we should not, at this moment, see the evil renewed, thirteen days after that reply. The vice consul received from the Lieutenant Governor an answer, dated the 9th of October. In this answer, the Lieutenant Governor pretends not to have read the second letter from the consul, of the 29th of September, and does not reply to it; he speaks of the Mutiny, and says it was not allowed to him to send it, because at that time, as you justly observe, that is to say, twenty-five days after her entering into your ports with a French prize.

You here ask me, sir, where I find reasons to support a predilection for England. I shall answer you with the same confidence you interrogate me. I observe that our consuls are abused by specious correspondences, merely to cover inactivity; that our enemies are permitted to do what they please, from the want of precise instructions to the commandants of ports, which should authorize them to act immediately on such contraventions of the treaty taking place near the coast. If the consul had not sent his second letter in due form, and complied with the request contained in the first, he could not have prevented the capture; and given them orders, we could not, at this moment, see the evil renewed, thirteen days after that reply. The vice consul received from the letter of the Governor of 9th August, 1793, addressed to the custom house and militia officers, which was among the enclosures of your letter of 29th February. He says, in speaking of the prizes suspected of having been made by vessels armed and equipped in the ports of the United States, that our consul should be apprized that all such requests as he will receive for the registration of prizes, you will immediately have them seized by your militia. As the 5th of December following, he gave additional orders for having seized, in like manner, the prizes alleged to have been made within the jurisdiction line of the United States, and if he has not informed them of the said seizure, as there are few prizes, as I have already said, which will not be alleged to have been made in the waters of the United States, or by vessels which have augmented their armaments in them, we still see prizes arrested in the first place, and examined afterwards. Why did not Mr. Lee authorize the commandant at Norfolk to cause previously to be forwarded to him, the capture of the vessel which was again and again, and with so much proof of his activity in doing justice to my complaints, that I could not avoid saying I had no need of them to confirm me that the most prompt severity has never been omitted to be employed towards us. If I were disposed to cite new examples, I could mention the affair of the corvette Perseverance. I was permitted to write to the consul residing there, and without objection the most common due respect to a public vessel by the law of nations, and stipulated for ours by treaty. I might cite the vigor with which a vessel going to Guadaloupe, and suspected, indeed, of an infraction of the rules of your neutrality, had been arrested at Norfolk. I leave it to impartial men to compare this energetic conduct with the orders lately given against the English vessels which refused to respect your neutrality, and the alteration of those orders almost immediately after they were issued.

As to the affair of the corvette Perseverance, it was in vain to support the conduct, in that respect, with what the commandant could say on his scatte of Argonaut, which took her, should not have been permitted to enter more readily than herself; and that, having been partially equipped in your waters, should have been proscribed. I shall not take the trouble to examine the deposition of Butler, the pilot, and his retraction. To judge of the merit of such a little fact, I think I know the terms of the treaty, pro and the con, and in which officers persons may have informed Butler that he had been imposed on, or mistaken.

After having reviewed the different particular cases upon which I have complained, permit me to give an opinion which has weight with me, which is, that it is impossible for me, among the constructions given to that part of the treaty, to discover the intention of the two contracting parties. It will therefore be impossible to make the article so literate as to prevent it from providing, and always keeping in my mind, and present it to you, under circumstances in which there is nothing to assure me that the President cannot admit my observations. I am therefore disposed to what I have done so, I should content myself with referring them to the French Government.

I have gone over in detail the different points stated in our correspondence: let us return to that part of your letter which considers the neutrality of the United States.

I conceived, sir, that the respect and circumspection with which I had touched on this question would have spared me the bitter reflections which your letter appears to contain on that matter. However great may be my desire to enter into details for my own defense, yet I shall waive them, from the same motives which dictated my first letter. There has been with me and with the American minister, a scrupulous wish to conform to the treatment and the ground of the Government of the United States on the subject of these measures. I might make it doubted that I had really been informed, by your proposition, of the English regulations and especially of the English restrictions with which neutral commerce is assailed in all wars. I might, in like manner, hesitate to admit that the Federal Government had not sufficient grounds to demand their revocation. But that would lead, against my inclination, into an examination of the cases in which a neutral Power should actually acknowledge its right to demands in such places. It should also be obliged to examine whether the principles upon which the English Government endeavor to support itself are consecrated by the law of nations, or whether they are not rather established to serve on the present occasion whether, in changing the language, the cabinet of London has changed its measures, whether the successive orders of the 8th June and 6th November, 1795, and of the 8th January, 1794, are not variations of the same system, to which the depredations

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 13, 1795.

SIR:—I have not been able to acknowledge sooner your letter of the 8th instant, which I had the honor of receiving on the same day.

If the plan pursued in mine of the 29th ultimo be more extensive than the one proposed in yours of the 2d, you will ascribe the enlargement of it to my solicitude to remove every dissatisfaction felt by the minister of our ally. A part, however, of that plan being, to collect, with fidelity, the facts applicable to your various charges, and to consult with my colleagues, I now reply to it in whole, the concepts and peculiarities of the French republic and of the United States, and the support of their neutrality upon a respectable footing towards and against all. I conceive it my duty to point out a thing as infinitely desirable, which is, that nothing definitively be concluded as to the treaty submitted for the ratification of the Senate, until my successor, who is momentarily expected, shall have communicated the substance of the articles which, I have reason to believe, have been signed upon that important subject. I conjure you, sir, to submit this reflection immediately to the President.

I have but one word more to say, sir, on the close of your letter, in which you recur to contracts between the powers of the United States and France. I have had in my mind a resolution to move the Congress, that the Cherokees, their endeavors are still making to injure the harmony existing between the two nations. I do not think that any one has ever given greater evidence of myself than a sincere desire of cultivating it. Still less can I admit, notwithstanding some of your expressions, that your object was to imbibe me with fear as to the manner in which I have conformed to that law, nor can I consent, that a public man, who, from any personal considerations whatsoever, should compend with his duty, would be unworthy the confidence of his country.

Accept, sir, &c.

JH. FAUCHET.

*It appears that, after this letter had been drafted, and while it was transcribing, Mr. Adet was received as the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic, to whom, in consequence, it was sent.
inquiries. What, if they have erred? When a party thinks himself aggrieved by the sentence of an inferior court, he may apply to the circuit court of his district. If it appears to be erroneous, it must be corrected by the circuit court, the sentence by the parties themselves, and conclusive. If an appeal be admitted, and the judges, in the last resort, give sentence according to their conscience, though it should be erroneous, yea, as, "in doubtful questions, different men think and judge differently, all that a friend can desire, is, that Justice should be as impartially administered, to the people of the country."

A defect of integrity in our judges will not be vindicated, when it shall be once ascertained; and if such a blot defiles the records of the American forum, by detecting it, you will deserve the tribute of being instrumental to the salvation of millions.

It is with regret we are forced to the unhappy conclusion, that we have been introduced to the views of the law in this disgrace, and disbelieve that political predilections have ever transpired in any of their decrees.

Second. The district court of South Carolina, and the circuit court held for the United States in that state, have both condemned Talbot's prize. But she was condemned, not because the commission, delivered by the Governor of South Carolina, had been violated, but because, she is said, the United States, in her "appearance in an American port," proceeded thence to Gaudaloupe for the express purpose of changing the property, and applying for a commission, obtained the commission within two days of the sale of the vessel, and under color of that commission, she was taken. Whereas, the port of Gaudaloupe, in the opinion of the Executive, which has been confirmed by your honor, is an American port; armed in an American port, for the express purpose of cruising under it, was only repelled.

It is true that a final decision has not yet taken place; the reason of which is, that the captors, having already been defeated in two courts, are resolved to try the chance of the supreme court of the United States. Nor have weARGE any case, of which I which you might come to have been informed from a respectable quarter, that, notwithstanding the apparent sale of the vessel, the prizes which should be made by her were, principally, if not altogether, to be the property of the American citizens who were her owners when she sailed for Gaudaloupe.

Third. That a difference of opinion has prevailed at New York and Charleston, as to the prizes of the City of Marseilles, is at least the consequence of a governmental concert. It may be easily accounted for by supposing, as the truth is, that the culpability of that privatser was un- known to vessels, and has been, as is the case with Charleston.

Mr. Dallas, the Secretary of Pennsylvania, wrote on the 24th January, 1794, in the name of the Governor of that State, to the Secretary of War, requesting to be informed whether the opening of free port holes on each side of that vessel, for the mounting of guns, could be deemed an augmentation of her military equipments. The Department of the Navy, being informed that the vessel stood the 22d of January, had received, and Captain of the ship, in a letter from the Secretary of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, dated the 24th instant, in which it is stated that an application has been made to open five port holes on each side of the French vessel called the Citizen of Marseilles, which is now in the dockyard at Pensylvania, of the Executive, and by the circumstances of the case, the proposed alteration could be deemed an augmentation of her military equipments.

"This letter, sir, has been submitted to the President of the United States, who has directed me to inform you that the said port holes having been closed previously to the arrival of the said vessel in this port, that the opening of them, in order to mount cannon therein, would, in his judgment, be as much as augmentation of the face of the said vessel, as if the port holes were now to be cut for the first time, and that the measure, therefore, is to be prevented.

It is to be remembered, that the same principle operated in the decision of the President, in July last, relatively to the British letter of marque ship Jane, whose force was reduced to the same situation it was at the time of her arrival, by closing her new port holes, dismasting the additional cannon, and destroying, or relarding, her new gun carriages, before she was permitted to leave the port.

The prohibition against the augmentation of an armament is, that, if granted to any vessel, if, in the judgment of the Executive it, in any given circumstances, would render her more dangerous to the maritime commerce of the United States, the measure would be thought necessary for the protection of the same; and this intention to interfere, is the only reason why the Executive, if it should grant permission, have a right to interpose, in cases of an augmentation of the armament of capturing vessels in our ports.

Fourth. The measures, chosen first by the Government for enforcing its rules, were, through the agency of its own vessels, and therefrom resulted, will be, in the suppression of British as well as French armaments in our ports; and in your wish that they had continued to be used, as they were in the year 1793, in relation to the prizes which were questioned.

Mr. Dallas, sir, that, although the Executive was at first competent in authority to retain under his special direction prizes, made by vessels which had been equipped in derogation of our sovereignty, it would have been more expedient to refer them to the courts. Until the law of fifth June, 1794, their jurisdiction could not have been said to be established. Being conferred by law, the President could not withdraw it. Or, if he should withdraw it, there would not have been, from a confidence in their virtue, wisdom, firmness, and disinterestedness; men, approved by the Senate from the same confidence; men, whose forms and habits peculiarly qualify them for nice examinations of evidence and law; men who judge not, in your phrase, according to "factual," but, for any facts which they may consider, may be harassed by legal process, so may foreigners; but, as the protection to our citizens is in the damages which the courts may award, so will it be extended to foreigners.

That any of the contested prizes remained in the hands of the consuls was originally an act of respectability to the French; but no Executive could perpetrate it against the will of the Judiciary. This is expressed in a letter from my Department to your predecessor, on the 9th of September, 1793, thus: "The intention of the letter of June 25th having been to permit such vessels to remain in the custody of the consuls, instead of that of a military guard, (which, in the case of the ship William, appeared to be disagreeable to you) the indulgence was given in your favor; but, in case the Executive might take or keep possession of the vessel as a military guard, and not to interfere with the authority of the courts of justice, in any case wherein they should undertake to act. My letter of June 29th, accordingly, in the same case of the ship William, informed you, that no precaution was taken to protect you from a confidence in their virtue, wisdom, firmness, and disinterestedness; men, approved by the Senate from the same confidence; men, whose forms and habits peculiarly qualify them for nice examinations of evidence and law; men who judge not, in your phrase, according to "factual," but, for any facts which they may consider, may be harassed by legal process, so may foreigners; but, as the protection to our citizens is in the damages which the courts may award, so will it be extended to foreigners.

As to the bond which you requested, my letter of the 22d of October, 1794, has told you that the Executive could not, as a matter of policy, interfere with the consuls, that they were always sufficiently secure under the usages of the courts. The instruction, however, to the Governors, also on the 22d of October, 1794, render a double recourse both to the Executive and Judiciary not easily practicable. The previous inquiry by the Executive, which you could suggest, only contributed to delay. For, if the President, by a direction that the case be referred to the courts, the decision of the courts, as an intrusion by those courts, and the judicial proceedings would go on notwithstanding. So speak the constitution and the law.

The principle has never entertained any other "theory" of our admiralty courts being uncontrollable, than this: that they are entirely independent of Executive mandates; that their decrees are not to be questioned by foreign nations, within the principles which I have quoted under the first division of this letter; and that the treaty with France checks them in regard to prizes, only after it has been established that what is claimed as a prize is a prize, and not plunder from our own citizens, or other neutrals. Permit me here to observe, that you have misconceived me, when you suppose that "all the armed vessels of your nation, which have brought prizes into the United States," are viewed by me as pirates; very far was this aspersión from my intention. Be pleased to revise my expression. If you shall be satisfied, that, from haste or other cause, you have misunderstood me, you will cancel the impression which you may have had of my misrepresentation of your minister. I have the short delight by disavowing any such sentiment. I meant to stigmatize those French cruisers only who captured the property of ourselves, or of other people not associated in the war.

Fifth. Although it may be seriously apprehended that a diplomatic intercourse, shall be occupied in calculating your retrospective laws, you may dwellly, it would be difficult, yet will I once more run over the minutia of the Terciphecho, and of her prize la Montagne and l'Esperance.

The first circumstances of official sloth, which has been attributed to the Governor of Virginia, is his omission to answer the vice consul's letter of the 31st August, 1793, until the 25th of September, vice consul. He was, in fact, under the instructions of government, how it was addressed, so as to be considered by any other person, in case of the Governor's absent appears nowhere. Nor is it material; for, by accident, not by design, the Governor was not on the spot when it reached Richmond. In the meantime, however, it is, that, on the 25th of September, two other English frigates entered Hampton with two French prizes; and the same day the vice consul sent a new complaint to the Executive of Virginia. You have yourself furnished good grounds to suspect that this letter never attained its destination. However, sir, if you add this to be important, I request you to specify the names of those frigates, and every other particular that may be necessary to the case, the manner in which I may better judge of the accusation.

Thirdly. You insist that the Governor ought, on the 12th of September, to have given orders to the officers whom it concerned. It is not improbable that the very apology which you offer, for the silence of the agents of France, or our part of the executive rules of 1793, may have prevented the subject of it from reaching Governor's mind at that instant; "that the English had not before had a maritime force upon our coast." Perhaps it might have been considered, as requiring no small share of circumspection to drive from our rivers the public ships of a foreign nation. Had the Governor of Virginia been situated as some other Governors are, he might have issued an order for the departure of the capturing vessel immediately on her arrival. As it was, he might well have been backward until he should have been driven by necessity to depute others upon such an occasion. But be this as it may, the "circular letter" from this Department, on the 10th of October, 1794, is demonstrative of the sincerity of the Executive, in preparing for the emergency, as it arises. With that spirit of readiness, in those cases, in tracing the consuls on, as you represent, by ostensible correspondences which cover nothing but inexcusables (lenteurs) nor yet in the want of satisfactory instructions; which were not delayed more than twenty-eight days upon an extreme computation, and much less upon an accurate one; I protest that I have not, in all cases, have own few, very few indeed; and only believe in one State, whose Executive resides at a distance from the seaboard.

Fourthly. The Governor's letters, on the 23d August, and 3d of December, 1793, to the commanders of countries, are exhibited as a mark of rancor against the French republic. You assert that of August 23d, "because, in the opinion of the President of the United States, this was made without the consent of the French (as not belonging to the United States, says what did not apply to any but French vessels.)" Consult his own language. "It having been decided by the President of the United States that no armed vessel which has been, or shall be, originally fitted, in any part of the United States, as a prize or privateer; by either of the parties at war, or have any vessel, in any of the parts of the United States, in case any vessel, within the foregoing description, should arrive in any port or harbor, with the consent of your county, you are to cause her to be ordered to depart immediately, and in case of her refusal, you are to take effectual measures to oblige her to depart. Force is not to be used in such cases, but to procuring the departure of the enemy's vessel or vessels shall have been or brought, subsequent to the fifth instant, or should hereafter send or bring, any prize or prizes into any port or harbor within your county, you will cause such prize or prizes to be immediately secured by your militia, for the purpose of delivering the same out of cruisers or any vessel. On the 23d of June, 1793, shows that it had operated upon an English privateer, armed in Georgia. It would have operated equally upon English prizes, if it had not been for the exclusion stipulated by treaty in favor of France of all prizes but those of the French. Were the treaty out of the way, so that prizes, made by the English, might enter our harbors, the Governor's order would involve them in its scope, and would arrest them also, if captured by an illicit privateer. The letter of the 5th of December orders the commandant of the "in case they should take possession of any vessel upon an allegation of her having been captured within three miles and a half of our seacoast, in any river or bays, they will be pleased to certify the same to the Governor, that he may direct the manner in which the witnesses shall be examined." You have interpreted this letter into "an additional order to cause to be seized the prize or prizes upon which an allegation is made that the officers shall seize upon any allegation, but delineates a particular step in case they should seize; when to seize upon an allegation, was an affair of discretion with them. That discretion, like the discretion of every public officer, was to be regulated by a reasonable degree of evidence. Truly, sir, I should conteract my own knowledge of the French, were you the only evidence in which I would guide myself. It is enough to ask, if it be possible that the Governor of a State, designated to preserve our neutrality would ever suffer vessels to be torn from the French captors, upon the naked declaration of a British proprietor that they have taken possession of our jurisdiction? Has it ever been done? Your answers and mine cannot, I am persuaded, be widely variant from each other.

The observations which you have been pleased to communicate to me, upon the subject of l'Esperance, have not shed those lights which I wished. Perhaps I was entitled to expect a more ample elucidation; since you persist in your explanation, and since the existence of the capture, the conflicting expressions of the French vice consul, and the equivocal footing of Butler's affidavit, utterly deprive us of the means of information. Mr. Hammond has indeed forwarded to me a letter from Admiral Murray, an extract of which refers to the capture of this corvette. "The French steep of war l'Esperance, was brought into Lynhaven Bay, on the 11th January, (a few days after my letter to you,) having been driven into the river, by the vessel, that among others, a lieutenant, with a sufficient number of men only to navigate her, (not being half the complement the French had in her,) were sent on board from the Resolution and Argonaut, and so soon as the weather permitted those ships to come within sight, they were ordered to bring in, with water and provisions, I sent her to sea, that I might give no umbrage to the American States, whom, having had a long voyage, I sent to Norfolk, as soon as prudent would admit: otherwise they might have been kept prisoners on board the whole winter, and sent to Halifax in the spring; nor was she equipped or armed, at all. She had no cargo, and gave me any communication, which she received. I am in Lynhaven, and when at sea only an acting order to command her, which is customary and absolutely necessary in all captures, otherwise, if retaken by the enemy, she might be considered as a pirate." Mr. Murray's letter recommends, at least, that a full inquiry be made and without your aid, I do not as yet discover any certain resort for an explanation of this affair.

Sixth. You remonstrated, on the 23rd of September, 1794, on the search and treatment of the Favorite, and on the 25th I wrote to you the following letter: "I regret extremely that any citizen of the United States, and more especially one who is entitled to a certain degree of respect for himself to a nation, should have been thus unmercifully treated. I have pursued the cause to the very source, and am now writing to the attorney of the district of New York, to inquire into and report the facts, as you will perceive from the enclosed copy. The course might have been shortened by directing to proceed in the case as the law directs, but this has not been adopted, because we wish to reserve to ourselves the decision in this particular as it is his suggestion that a public officer is concerned, and we take an interest in making justice to be done to our republic, as far as possible under our own eye." On the 22d of October, the day after I had received the documents from the district attorney of New York, I enclosed them to you; and on the 17th of November, 1784, this business was concluded, I imagined, in the following letter to you: "The Executive of the United States being obliged to collect information of facts, at a distance, through the public officers, and having a confidence in them, it was conceived sufficient, in the first instance, merely to transmit to you the evidence which had been obtained respecting the Favorite. Hence, in the letter which I had the honor of writing to you on that occasion, I did no more than assert the conclusions, reserving any reflections until it should be ascertained, on your part, whether the allegations were true. "The opinion which the President has formed relieves both you and myself of no small difficulty in comparing and reconciling the facts; and we are

He has thought proper to instruct me to inform you that, on the faith which he always repose in your assertions, he takes these points for granted: that the Favorite is a public vessel of war, bearing the commission of the French republic; and that no contravention of the act prohibiting the exportation of military stores was meditated, in the Letters which were enclosed with the board. "The President highly disapproves, that a public vessel of war, belonging to a foreign nation, should be searched by officers of the customs, upon a suspicion of illicit commerce. The propriety of representing such a suspicion to the consul of that nation, or the commander of the vessel, will be therefore given to pursue this course, with the view that, if it should be ineffectual, the Government of the United States may adopt those measures which the necessity of the case and their rights may require. "In conclusion, founded on the same principles, will be also forwarded to the collector of New York; with this addition, to discontinue the prosecution against the property, and restore what may be within his power or command. At the same time, I must repeat the assurance which we entertain, that you will prevent the stores from being used in any manner contrary to the act before referred to. "I flatter myself, sir, that this separation of what is past, and the precaution against the future, will manifest such a disposition in our Government as will induce you to approve the decision which a sense of justice imposes upon the President, to waive any further measures: for the appearance and circumstances of the Favorite might have been represented to an approach of war with the French republic, in the consideration that, in our new situation, it cannot be expected that all our officers should meet every occurrence with a correct knowledge of the usages of nations. "An insult to the French flag will not be tolerated by the President, whenever he can prevent or punish it. But it is my opinion, that a vessel in foreign waters, having her flag displayed, is to be in any predication whatsoever, the countermanding of the orders given by the Governor of Virginia to the militia officers of Norfolk, to refuse comfort to British vessels, using our waters as a station, cannot be tortured into any connexion with her. For the act of the President never authorized the State Executives to issue such an order; nor do I understand the French republic herself will be injured by the adverse conduct of the Federal Executive; and you may determine, from my correspondence with Mr. Hammond on this subject, what the President finally contemplated. "Upon this point a few words will be sufficient. Of the reaction towards Great Britain, and of the reparation to be made, the United States are the only legitimate judges. They will adapt the one and the other to their estimate of their own power and interest. Being the defenders of their own honor and welfare, they will not be suspected of voluntarily abandoning either; and if they do not mount to the pitch which the French republic would procure, their good will and intentions towards us will be at least as strong as those which you call, sir, lukewarm to our ancient ally, is an upright neutrality. The new arrangements against which you have expressed yourself, are a part of the great subject which is now at the disposal of the Senate. "There are some miscellaneous matters, which remain to be touched briefly. We are constructing the article of the treaty to explanations between the two Governments. But, in the mean time, I must own that I do not feel the importance of Mr. Hammond's acknowledgment to your letter. He had contended that, under our treaty with France, we could not expel the prizes made by the British cruisers in foreign waters, and that we must either claim them from the British Government, or leave them as such vessels to return to their owners. In his letter dated yesterday, he says, that the reason why we had adopted respecting the cruisers themselves, and which, by his literal exposition, would be defeated. You do not seem to be aware of the dilemma to which this mode of reasoning exposes you. If Mr. Hammond be correct, then are your complaints against the admission of prizes, and our anxiety to prevent it, wholly unfounded; and I am not quite sure whether the instructions be interpreted in the same sense. You will surely be of no availing whether a British minister reasons well or ill though I do not recollect that he has repeated this branch of his position since he has been apprised of its tendency. Whereover truth lies, it is our duty to follow; and I rest our construction upon this frank principle: that, notwithstanding the letter of the treaty, its spirit, its context, and the rules of interpretation, will uphold the regulations of our Government. In a procedure like this, it will not be easy to find a leaning or subservience to Great Britain. It is a leaning and subserviency to the character of our nation. Your letter strongly demonstrates the propriety of my remark, that a neutral nation, while it defends itself against charges from one of the warring Powers, may seem to palliate the misdoings of another. But we surely ought to have been exempt from this reflection; as you are particularly desired not to infer, from my justification of the Executive, that the validity of the proclamation of blockade is assented to as you admit: "that we are indignant at the injuries which Great Britain has done us"; and as we have employed every means which is not in violation of national law to screen our nation from any accretion, we permit yourself to be more sensitive in your accusations we cannot surrender the consciousness of our political purity. It is in real regret that I read in your last letter an idea that we have not done justice to your proclamation, to your displeasure at the crew of the Conqueror, and to your general conduct towards, and Government of the United States, because we are incapable of being convinced of our power to evince any encouragement, we can never intend to plant in your breast so unworthy a motive. As you again disdain an approbation of Mr. Genet's excesses, so am I not scrupulous to confess that I should not have recurred to them, had I not inferred from your letter an inclination to bring them up with some share of countenance to them. But this being, as you inform me, the moment of our feelings, as intended to be written before the President would have been stated to you more formally and minutely—the citizens of the United States have a right, and will exercise the right, freely to investigate the measures of Government, to view them as they come before the Executive to whom he is accredited, upon any of those measures affecting his country. But it will ever be denied as a right of a foreign minister, that he should endeavor, by an address to the people, oral or written, to forestall a depending measure, or to defeat one which has been decided. This remark is made more, because it cannot be erroneously wrested into a defence or outcry of the treaty with Great Britain and because it is an assertion of the sovereignty of the United States, consistent with what is past, and we trust not likely to be contradicted hereafter. I cannot conclude this letter without offering to you my sincere wishes for your happiness, and a personal assurance of the great respect and esteem, with which I have the honor to be, EDM. RANDOLPH.

SIR: I must beg the favor of you to inform me for what cause a libel has been filed against the French privateer La Vengeance, and her Spanish prize. As many particulars as you can conveniently give me will be acceptable, Mr. Adet being very urgent in his complaint of the arrest. I will thank you to add, what previous examination, or rather what degree of evidence, usually precedes an order for arresting vessels in the situation of the foregoing. Your answer by the earliest moment will greatly oblige me.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, the 15th Thermidor, (August 9, 1795.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR:

Among other documents which I have received from citizen Berard, captain of the privateer La Vengeance, and all of which incontestably prove that his vessel was not armed on this continent, there is one, of which I send you a copy.

This is a copy of the information of the district attorney of New York, upon which the seizure of the ship La Vengeance was grounded, accompanied by a certificate of the clerk of the court, who attests that no affidavit, no proof, was produced in support of this information.

Since I had the honor to write to you on this affair, an offer has been made to Captain Berard to release his vessel upon giving security. He refused; and persists in claiming the removal of the seizure without any condition, and with a reservation of his right to damages and interest. Justice supports his claim. In fact, what signifies security? Will it alone for the infraction of treaties, if it is proved by the decree that the privateer was armed on the continent?

I repeat the request, which I have already made to you, to remove the seizure which has been made of citizen Berard’s vessel. Permit me to remark to you, that a longer detention will considerably increase the indemnity he claims; and it will occasion unnecessary expense when a decree shall be pronounced on the merits of the business.

The vouchers which have been communicated to me established the fact in so clear a manner, that I have not the least doubt as to the issue of the suit instituted between the captor and the prizes, notwithstanding the employment, in the defence of this bad cause, of the English expedient—subornation.

I have in my hands a convincing proof of this last fact.

Accept, sir, &c.

District Court of the United States of America for the New York District.

Be it remembered, that Richard Harrison, attorney of the United States of America for the New York district, who prosecutes for the said United States, being present here in the court, the eleventh day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, in his proper person, doth, on behalf of the said United States, inform the court, that, between the sixth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, and the time of exhibiting this information, Aquila Giles, Esq, marshal of the district of New York, did, at the city of New York, in the New York district, seize to the use of the said United States, as forfeited, a certain schooner or vessel, called La Vengeance, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with four swivels and ten carriage guns, mounted on board of the said schooner, being of the goods and chattels of some person or persons to the said schooner unknown: for that the said schooner, or vessel, after the said sixth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, and between the said day and the time of exhibiting this information, was fitted out and armed, within some or one of the ports, harbors, bays, rivers, or other waters of the said United States, to wit, at the city of New York, in the New York district, with intent that the said schooner or vessel should be employed in the service of a foreign State, to wit, of the republic of France, to cruise upon the subjects of the King of Spain, the said King being then and now at peace with the said United States; and that the said four swivels and ten carriage guns were, between the said time, procured at the place aforesaid, for the equipment of the said schooner with the intent aforesaid, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided. By reason whereof, the said schooner or vessel, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the said swivels and carriage guns, have become forfeited. Whereof, the said attorney for the said United States prays the judgment of the court in the premises; and that the said schooner La Vengeance, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the said swivels and carriage guns, may, for the reason aforesaid, remain forfeited according to the form of the said statute.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, August 11, 1795.

SIR:

Since my last letter to you respecting the privateer La Vengeance and her prize, the enclosed papers have been transcribed, and I avail myself of the earliest moment to forward them.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.
Sir,

In the absence of Mr. Harrison, who is attending our supreme court at Albany, Mr. Ludlow has put into my hands your letter of the 30th ult, to Mr. Harrison, on the subject of the suits depending against the French privateer La Vengeance, and her Spanish prize.

The suit was filed at the district court of the United States for this district, in behalf of Don Diego Pintado, a subject of the King of Spain, against the ship San Joseph, alias La Princesa de Asturias, her tackle, apparel, furniture, and appurtenances, and the cargo on board of her. A copy of the libel is enclosed.

On the filing of this libel, the usual process was issued to the marshal, in virtue of which he took the ship and her cargo, the vessel and the goods. About one the 13th instant, the French privateer La Vengeance, filed his answer and claim in the suit so instituted in behalf of Don Diego Pintado, a copy of which answer and claim is also enclosed. The suit was instituted upon the official application of the Spanish consul for this district, and was authorized by a letter from the Spanish consul to the late Commissioner of the United States in Philadelphia, instructing the latter to take proceedings for the recovery of the property; and if this were the fact, the legal inference drawn from it was, that the forcible detention of the Spanish ship and her cargo by the French privateer in this port was illegal; and consequently, that the subject of the King of Spain was entitled to the aid of the courts of the United States, to compel a restoration of his property.

Upon the filing of the libel in question, it was not necessary, by the course of proceeding in courts of admiralty, or by any law of the United States, or by any law or usage of this State, that the libel should be accompanied by any affidavit or evidence whatsoever, to verify the allegations contained in it. The libellant has instituted his suit, as in all similar cases, at the peril of paying costs and adequate damages to the claimant, in case the final decree in the suit would be against the libellant. For the payment of these costs and damages, security to the satisfaction of the claimant has been taken. The suit has been at issue for some days past, and divers witnesses have been examined on both sides. On the part of the libellant it has been testified in substance, that the privateer in question is a very fast boat, well armed for point, being provided with some trained men; that she had no canvas shut; that the privateer being in the port of Philadelphia in the month of March last, (under the character of a merchantman) appearances manifested an intention of fitting her out as a privateer. These appearances were communicated to the Spanish consul, who caused her to be searched. The officers of the cutter, who had been sent out, and hinged put on them; that iron was fixed on her bow for swivels; that she had a great number of water casks in her hold, and a very large caubose on board of her; that the water casks were too numerous, and the caubose too large, for the accommodation of such a vessel on a common trading voyage; that Captain Berard, who commanded the ship, was an officer from a vessel of the French Treasury, her having been taken in the port of Philadelphia, and at the distance of about thirty or forty miles by a vessel of the United States, sent to her as a privateer; that she could not be protected by the interference of the Government; that the said caubose remained on board, and was alleged by the captain to be intended for the accommodation of a number of passengers; that on or about the twenty-third day of March last, the privateer, so asforesaid reduced as to her military equipments, sailed from the port of Philadelphia, and at the distance of about thirty or forty miles both before and after she met with a vessel lying at anchor, and waited for her; that thereafter the privateer came to, and two cannon, being three pounders, two swivels, some muskets, pistols, sabres, pikes, and some bullets (rather of a larger caliber than the cannon) were taken from the shallap and put on board; that the said equipments were reduced, repaired, and mounted on theHook, and anchored within the Hook, about the distance of two musket shots from the Hook, the day before Easter; that soon after her said arrival at the Hook, she was visited by Captain Dennis, of the revenue cutter, who asked what vessel she was, and from whence she had come. The answer, received through one Wilson, was, that she had come from Guadaloupe. Upon which Captain Dennis further asked, what passage she had had. The reply was, fifteen or sixteen days. Captain Dennis then repeatedly desired to see the papers of the privateer, but they were constantly refused, upon the pretext that the privateer was upon a secret mission, which could be communicated only to the French consul; that upon this the pilot, who had sought the privateer from below the fort above mentioned, had replied: 'Your vessel is the privateer of the Hook; by your consuls she was sent to the Hook only for shelter, and that she wanted nothing; that Captain Dennis hereupon offered the captain a passage in the revenue cutter to the city of New York, which was refused; that thereupon Captain Dennis left the privateer that wolf; Captain Dennis was on board of the vessel occasioned by the said ship, which at the time of searching Captain Berard, whilst her real captain was Jean Antoine Berard; that on the very day Captain Dennis left the privateer, Captain Berard went to the city of New York, and in the course of three or four days afterwards, a boat came down to the privateer so at anchor within the Hook, with forty-eight chests of gunpowder, each chest weighing two hundred and fifty pounds; that the chests were landed there, and that the said captain shortly after the same was landed, arrived at Port de Paix; that when the privateer left Philadelphia she had about thirty men on board, who were all sailors or volunteers belonging to the privateer, as is believed; that at Port de Paix the privateer was careened and her bottom overhauled; and she was afterwards, in four pieces of cannon, (being four pounders) some fresh biscuit, and some muskets and blankets to replace some seamen who had deserted, and Captain Berard there also received a privateer commission from General Laveaux; that soon after Captain Dennis had left the vessel as aforesaid, he arrived at Port de Paix; that when the privateer left Philadelphia she had about thirty men on board, who were all sailors or volunteers belonging to the privateer, as is believed; that at Port de Paix the privateer was careened and her bottom overhauled; and she was afterwards, in four pieces of cannon, (being four pounders) some fresh biscuit, and some muskets and blankets to replace some seamen who had deserted, and Captain Berard there also received a privateer commission from General Laveaux; that from Port de Paix the privateer went to the Cape, and thence on a cruise, and in the course of three days cruising she took the prize in question.

The above are some of the matters testified on the part of the libellant, but the examinations on either side are not yet closed. It will be the testimony of the parties hereafter, or it is impossible to say. All the depositions will be given to the cause which circumstances admit of. Subpoenas are now on their way to Philadelphia, to be served on several witnesses residing there, and whose attendance is required in this court on the 14th instant.

In the name of all persons interested, I am, etc.

Mr. Troup, Clerk of the District Court of New York, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State.

NEW YORK, August 7, 1796.
FRANCE.

by a sense of duty to communicate the information. The suit against the privateer is also at issue, and nearly the same testimony which is above stated has already been taken in its and further testimony, to put it on the same footing with the suit against the prize, will be procured without delay. The final issue of the suit against the privateer is altogether a problem; but I have no doubt that at least probable cause will appear to justify her seizure and detention.

If any further information should be wanted, I will furnish it as soon as I am favored with your commands. In the mean time I have the honor to be, in behalf of Mr. Harrison, sir, &c.

Extract of a letter from Richard Harrison, District Attorney of New York, to the Secretary of State, dated August 13, 1795.

"With respect to the suit instituted against the French privateer La Vengeance, I have to refer you to Colonel Troup's letter of the 7th inst. with this single addition—that as the suit was commenced on behalf of the United States, from motives of duty, upon such evidence as (if unimpeached) would afford not only probable cause for seizure, but just ground for condemnation, so it will immediately be discontinued, from the same motives, if it shall be found that the weight of testimony is in favor of the claimant."

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of the Department of War of the United States, charged with the Department of State.

PHILADELPHIA, the 9th Vendémiaire, (September 24, 1795.)

4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:

I have duly received Mr. Randolph's letter of the 11th August, in which he enclosed copies of that written from New York on the subject of the privateer La Vengeance, and of the documents produced at the suit pending in the district court of that city against the privateer and her prize.

My objections are still the same, and I should have renewed my representations, if the weak replies I had received had not led me to imagine that I had little to hope from such a step. I therefore thought it my duty to wait until I should be possessed of authentic documents to discuss, at the same time, the points of right and fact.

These documents have come to hand.

I begin with the point of right.

The prize made by the privateer Vengeance of a Spanish ship is arrested upon the allegation of the consul of that nation, stating that this privateer had been armed in the United States.

Upon this simple allegation, without an affidavit, or any other testimony, the attorney of the district had the privateer arrested. He pretends that, affidavits are not necessary, and that, if the decree should be favorable to the privateer, the damages accruing from her arrestation shall be borne by the plaintiff. Besides, he undertakes to assert that the prize cannot escape condemnation.

It is not my province to dispute the responsibility for the damages and interest resulting from the arrest of the privateer, which is a matter foreign to the subject of the prize, and a punishment for a supposed violation of your neutrality. Therefore, I shall not discuss this part of the allegations of Mr. Attorney, which appears to me erroneous; it is not doubted that, in the final issue, the French privateer will have a right to claim damage and interest from the American Government.

But I again recur to the assertion, that an affidavit is not necessary for ordering the arrest of a vessel.

What is the law, what is the usage, which establishes the prosecution for redemption of an offence, before it be ascertained that it has been committed; and what certainty then had Mr. Attorney? His opinion. Upon what is it founded? The complaint of the Spanish agent, since there was not a single affidavit.

Now, sir, upon mere suspicions, which the enemy interest will not fail always to bring forward, the French privateers are to be subjected to seizure! Such a measure tends to nothing less than to paralyze the seventeenth article of our treaty.

Doubtless, sir, this is not the intention of your Government. No, the United States, under the veil of friendship, would not endeavor, by indirect means, to abuse the advantages of an alliance cemented by French blood.

I therefore protest against this illegal arrest—I request you, sir, to examine into the irregularity of it, and to order its removal.

You may do this, as it was the act of an agent of the executive power with the courts, and not that of the judiciary.

I return to the point of fact, that is to say, to the arming of the privateer in the United States. Like Mr. Attorney, I had my conviction; it was only a moral one; but it is now a physical one; among the numerous written documents which have come to my hands, I confine myself to the choice of four; of these I transmit you copies.

The first is the declaration of General Laveaux, stating that the vessel called la Dorade arrived at Port de Paix without any armament whatever; that she was sold to citizen Jacques Rouge, armed by him as a privateer, partly at that place, and partly at the Cape. This declaration is certified by the municipality of Port de Paix.

The second is a declaration of citizen Villatte, commandant at the Cape, stating that this privateer sailed from that place with six cannon.

The third is the bill of sale of la Dorade, done at Port de Paix, the 24th last Floréal, with an exact and minute inventory of every thing belonging to the vessel.

The fourth, and last, is a declaration of the master warden of the port of Philadelphia, proving that this vessel sailed without an augmentation of force.

The reading of these papers will convince you, sir, that Mr. Attorney was not founded in the opinion which he looked upon as a sufficient reason for authorizing and justifying the seizure, against which I complain.

As though this seizure were insufficient, Mr. Attorney, upon what foundation I know not, (probably, also, according to his opinion) has ordered a second seizure of the vessel, under the pretext that she exported arms and ammunition from the United States. I do not discuss, also, sir, this difficulty, superfluous in the main, but I complain of a step which is a formal insult, an outrage against the French republic, and myself as its representative.

The first point of difficulty was in discussion; I complained; a negotiation was opened between you and me; and this is the time Mr. Attorney chose to repeat the very thing about which I was complaining. He has violated usage and decency in the most wanton manner, since, admitting the second seizure to be well founded, it was useless for securing the penalty, as long as the first had not been removed.

I request justice, sir, and I am so much the more persuaded that you will readily render it to me, as you will be perfectly convinced that this is considerably less a question of the particular interest of the privateer, than of maintaining the principles of the alliance, and the rights of the French republic, for which you have repeated to me assurances of attachment which leave me no doubt of your dispositions.

Accept, sir, &c.

P.A. ADET.
THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

Etienne Laveaux, Commander in Chief of the French Windward Islands in America.

At the request of the owners and captain of the ship La Vengeance, formerly la Dorade, to certify all the facts and circumstances known to us relative to this vessel,

We, rendering homage to the truth, declare, that, on the 15 Floréal last (8 May, O. S.) the vessel called La Vengeance, formerly la Dorade, anchored in the road of Port de Paix, about eight or nine o'clock in the morning, that, immediately, the captain, named Francis Michel, was brought before us, as is customary, and, in presence of part of the army, declared that he had been charged, by the agents of the French republic near the United States, with a secret mission, of which he perfectly acquitted himself. This I do not conceive my duty to detail here. The vessel arrived as a merchant vessel, without either cannon or musket of any kind, and but slightly manned.

This mission being fulfilled, Francis Michel, attorney of John Barun, owner of the said vessel, sold her to citizen Jacques Rouge, of this town, agreeably to a bill of sale executed before Domingueaux and his partner, notaries at Port de Paix, the 24th last Floréal.

The citizen Jacques Rouge having chosen Jean Antoine Berard to command this vessel, requested letters patent from me to arm her as a privateer. I granted them on the 27th last Floréal, and they were registered in the records of the admiralty of this town, and in the office of the civil ordonnance.

Cannon being of great consequence for the defence of this town, citizen Berard could find very few. He asked me for three three-pounders, which were in one of our forts; I promised them to him, but having been obliged to erect a battery which was indispensable, I was under the necessity of omitting to fulfill it. He then requested permission to go to Bourg, for others: I could not permit him, on account of the utility of the artillery there. In a word, he found, at Port de Paix, but two cannon, three at Contarine, which he purchased, with my permission, of citizen Florestal, an inhabitant of that town.

Under these circumstances, citizen Berard went to the Cape to complete his armament. As I could not, after what had been done, refuse to accelerate the arming of this vessel, I wrote to Vilatte, commandant at the Cape, to render him assistance.

All the facts above related are perfectly true. It is a matter of public notoriety, that la Vengeance arrived here a commercial vessel; that she was sold to Rouge, a citizen of Port de Paix; that he obtained a commission for cruising against the enemies of the republic; that she was commanded by Jean Antoine Berard; that her armament begun here, under my own eyes; that it was completed at the Cape, in virtue of my letter to the commandant; that he sailed thence, on a cruise, against the enemies of the republic: therefore, the prize made by the said Berard, being by a privateer, legally armed, and agreeable to the laws of the French republic one and indivisible, cannot be contested.

In faith whereof, we have delivered the present declaration, to serve and avail when and where it ought.

Given at Port de Paix, under the seal of the republic, and countersigned by our secretary, the 1st Fructidor, 3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

In faith whereof, we have delivered these presents, signed with our hand, and sealed with the seal of the municipality.

No. 78.
24th Floreal, 3d year, sale of the schooner la Dorade, by Francis Michel to Jacques Rouge.

Before the undersigned, notaries of the French republic, in the jurisdiction of Port de Paix, island and coast St. Domingo, the present reading, appeared Francis Michel, captain of the schooner la Dorade, now anchored in this road:

Who, by these presents, in the name and as attorney of Baron, (the power of attorney having been shown to us) declares to have voluntarily sold, quit claimed, ceded, abandoned, and transferred, from this time and forever, promising hereby to warrant the same both in law and fact, to Jacques Rouge, merchant of Cape, now in this town, for himself, his heirs and assigns, the said schooner la Dorade, of the burden of about fifty tons, together with her boat, tackle, apparel, cables, anchors, appurtenances, and every thing thereunto belonging, without exception or reservation, which the said purchaser declared himself well acquainted with, and such as is designated in the inventory formed and executed by the said parties, signed and marked by them and the said notaries, which is annexed to these presents.

The present sale being thus made for and in consideration of the price and sum of 66,000 livres, which sum of 66,000 livres the said Francis Michel acknowledges to have received, before these presents, from the said Jacques Rouge, in money and colonial produce, furnished by the said Rouge for completing the said sum of 66,000 livres, whereof the said Francis Michel perfectly exonerates the said Rouge from the price of the said schooner la Dorade.

The said Francis Michel dispossessing himself in the name of the said Baron, of the ownership and possession of the said schooner la Dorade, in favor of the said Rouge, so that the latter may use and dispose of her from this day as a thing to him appertaining, by means of these presents, the said Rouge hereby acknowledging himself in possession of the said schooner, and as being therewith contented, because he has seen, visited, and examined, for that, &c. promising, &c. obliging, &c. an act thereto.

Done and passed at Port de Paix, in our chambers, the 24th Floreal, 3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible, and after reading the same to the said Francis Michel and Jacques Rouge.

BRESSAT, Notary.

Nath. Falconer, Esq. to Alex. J. Dallas, Esq. Secretary of the Commonwealth.

WARDEN'S OFFICE, July 3, 1795.

Sir:

I beg leave to inform you, in regard of the schooner Rose, that she cleared out at the custom house, on the 18th day of March, under the name of the Dorada. I never heard of her being permitted to clear out at the collector's office, until the 21st of the month, which I heard from the collector himself, that she was permitted to clear out. The complaint coming from the collector and surveyor, I concluded that the officers of Government were satisfied that there was no augmentation of force, or they would not have permitted her clearing out for the West Indies. I applied to the Governor for an order to let her pass the fort, which he gave at his own house to the officers of the fort, to let her pass on producing her clearance from the collector of the port, which I transmitted to the fort.

I am, &c.

N. FALCONER,

Master Warden of the port of Philadelphia.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Richard Harrison, Esq. District Attorney of New York, dated October 1, 1795.

"Herewith I transmit the translations of a letter of the 9th ultimo, and other papers, received from Mr. Adet, the minister of the French republic, relative to the privateer La Vengeance, arrested by process from the district court of New York, and her Spanish prize libelled in the same court. I beg you will again examine this business, and, as early as possible, favor me with such information as will enable me to make an answer to Mr. Adet, that may or ought to be satisfactory;"

DEPARTMENT OF STATE October 16, 1795.

Sir:

A divided attention between two departments I must pray you to accept as an apology for my delays in answering your letters and communicating expected information.

I now enclose an extract of a letter from Mr. Harrison, the district attorney for New York, relative to the privateer La Vengeance, and her prize; by which you will perceive that, whatever may be the event of the suits pending in court, concerning her and her prize, the public officer, Mr. Harrison, is supported, in his proceedings, by the laws and usages of this country, upon such evidence and information as, in the case referred to, were produced.

I am, very respectfully, sir, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

No. 82.

Extract of a letter from Richard Harrison, Esq. District Attorney of New York, to Colonel Pickering, dated October 3, 1795.

These observations will naturally lead to the case of the privateer La Vengeance, against which two suits have been brought on behalf of the United States; the suit against the prize being of a private nature, wherein, as attorney of the United States, I have no concern.

It is rather extraordinary that the mere institution of these suits, for offences against the laws of our country, should be considered as a just cause of complaint by the agents of a foreign nation; since, until the final sentence of the constitutional tribunals, it cannot be legally discerned whether the complaints are well founded, vexations, or properly instituted upon probable cause, though the scale of evidence may finally preponderate in favor of the accused.

Without advertising, however, to this point with the particularity it may deserve, I proceed to observe that, previous to the commencement of the first suit, such information was given as afforded, in my judgment, a probable cause for the prosecution. This did not arise, as the French minister supposes, from simple suspicion, or the mere allegation of the Spanish consul. That gentleman laid before me papers, carrying every appearance of authenticity, relative to the fitting out and arming of the privateer; and I had assurances, upon which I could depend, that direct evidence would be produced of illegal measures for this purpose, taken either in Philadelphia or elsewhere in the river Delaware.

Under these circumstances I judged it my duty to proceed officially, for the only breach of law with which I was then acquainted, and I should have esteemed myself culpable if I had neglected to do so. It was sufficient that I was assured of having the evidence at a proper time to manifest the perversity of the suit, and before that time it was unnecessary to possess it. Neither the laws of the country, nor the practice of our courts, required the filing of any previous affidavit where the suit was commenced by the attorney of the United States on their behalf; and such a practice might often be attended with pernicious consequences, by disclosing the name of the person who gave the information, and the nature of the evidence to be produced. Whatever, therefore, may be the ideas of persons unacquainted, or but little acquainted, with our laws, must be wholly immaterial upon this subject: but they may rest assured that I should never resort to any mere pretences in justification of my conduct, and I may safely challenge any person to produce the law which would render such an affidavit necessary, unless in case of a common informer.

The first suit against the privateer having been thus commenced, the testimony of her illegal armament, within the United States, has been actually furnished by more than one witness; but, in the course of the hearing, such a variety of clashing and contradictory evidence was produced, that it became impossible to foresee the event. This, you may remember, was, at a very early period, said to be problematical, though no doubt was entertained that probable cause would appear to justify the seizure and detention.

During the time of exhibiting the testimony in the cause originally commenced, it appeared, in evidence, by the showing of the claimant's witnesses, that the privateer had been employed in exporting ammunition from the United States, at a period when such exportation was prohibited. Had the fact been known in season, it would have formed a charge in the original suit; but, that not being the case, as soon as I was informed upon the subject, it became my duty to file another libel, for an apparent breach of the law, subjecting the vessel to condemnation. It was, however, in the summer of 1797, this libel was removed until the termination of the first, there might have been more color for complaint; since, in that case, the privateer might have undergone a second detention; whereas, in the present mode of proceeding, the claimant, if he thought proper, might bring both suits to a close at nearly the same period.

In this whole business, however, I have undoubtedly acted from my own opinion, founded upon such evidence as came to my knowledge; and as, in similar cases, I must necessarily, in the first instance, be unacquainted with the opinions and convictions of others, I know of no other rule by which I can be guided, unless when I am honored with the directions of the Chief Executive, it will be unnecessary, if not improper, for me to enter into a minute discussion of the materials produced by the French minister, or the evidence respecting the cause whilst it is a subject of judicial examination. Permit me, however, to observe: 1st, That, even if they are sufficient to warrant the acquittal of the privateer, it will by no means follow that the seizure and detention were improper; otherwise, it would be the necessary, in future cases, to try the cause before the commencement of the suit. 2dly, That the bill of sale has been produced to the district court on behalf of the claimant, and will receive from the justice of that court its proper interpretation, either as evidence of a genuine contract, or as a mere cloak to disguise the transaction. 3dly, That General Laveaux's certificate (whatever respect it may be entitled to) is not to be considered as evidence in the cause; and, if it could be made so, the claimant would be very cautious of producing it, on account of its differing from the witnesses.

And, 4thly, That the certificates of Mons. Vilatte and Mr. Falconer are such as do not contradict the supposition that the vessel may have been prepared and armed for privateering in the port of Philadelphia, and that she may have received it on board before she quitted the Delaware, though she required additional force in the West Indies.

NEW YORK, December 5, 1796.

SIR,
In Mr. Adet's official note to you of the 15th ult. I find a charge against me as one of the officers of Government, for delaying the decision of the suits instituted in the district court for this district, against the prize ship La Pintado, for a privateer. This charge is the reflection of interest and Government, in its foreign relations, are intimately connected with the conduct of its officers, I think it my duty to furnish you with the following state of facts.

I was appointed clerk of this district immediately after the courts of the United States were organized; and being then a soldier in the state courts, the judge of the district also permitted me to practise in the court. I was thus permitted to practise in the district court, I supposed myself at liberty to be concerned for Don Diego Pintado, as well as for any other individual. The suit which I instituted for him was not instituted wantonly, but upon information of real and actual witnesses. In the progress of the cause, these witnesses were contradicted by the witnesses produced on the part of the captors; and the decrees which were rendered in favor of the captors, under an order of the court that their witnesses were entitled to the greatest degree of credit. If the witnesses of Don Diego Pintado had not been contradicted by those of the captors, it cannot be doubted that he would have prevailed in the suit, for the reason already stated.

The libel of Don Diego Pintado was filed on the 3d, and the answer and claim of the captain of the privateer on the 15th of July, 1795. On the 17th of the same month the parties proceeded to examine their witnesses. It was not until the 15th of November following that the examination of witnesses for the captors was closed; and in two days afterwards the cause came on to be argued. The delay in taking the testimony did not arise from any circumstances which can cast even the shadow of an imputation upon me or the counsel associated with me. There were many witnesses on both sides; some of them came from Philadelphia, and others from the West Indies, where the cause was at issue and the documents were reduced to writing; and, besides the witnesses, the yellow fever prevailed in this city, and so general and destructive were its ravages, that Mr. Edward Lavigton, the proctor for the captors, deemed it prudent to retire to Long Island; Mr. Brockholst Livingston, one of their counsel, for the same reason, removed to Dutchess county, more than eighty miles up the North river, where he resided until the fever subsided; and their leading counsel, Mr. Dupontes, was at that time proctor for the captors, however, of Don Diego Pintado, continued in the city, and were at all times ready to do everything in their power to expedite the cause. On the 10th of December, 1795, the district judge pronounced his decrees in favor of his creditors, and the cause was immediately referred to the Spanish consular authority, to the next circuit court of the United States for this district, which by law could not be held before the 1st of April, 1796. Not long after the appeal was interposed, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Harrison, and I, had a conference with the Spanish consuls, at which we assured him it was our unanimous opinion that there was little or no probability of ultimate success in the cause, and therefore we could not advise the continuance of the appeal. The Spanish consuls, by reply, asked us for our opinion in writing, that he might transmit it to the Spanish consular general at Philadelphia, and receive his instructions. We accordingly delivered to the Spanish consuls a written opinion, subscribed with our names, in which we unanimously treated the cause as one that was nearly hopeless, and strongly disconmancened the further prosecution of it. We did not preserve a copy of this opinion, or I should now transmit it to you; the original, I understand, is in the hands of the Spanish consular general. In the course of a few days, after the Spanish consul had received our written opinion, he informed me that the agents of the Spanish Government at Philadelphia, having taken charge of the suit merely as public officers, felt themselves bound to pursue the direct course marked out by the laws of the United States, and to apply for the judgment of the court sitting in the last resort. This answer was decisive with the counsel for Don Diego Pintado. They were obliged in faithfulness to the trust reposed in them to prosecute the appeal and prepare it for argument at the circuit court appointed to be held on the 5th of April. This was done, business in the circuit court was active at that time; the writ of error was made returnable on the day appointed by the court, and forming a part of the record, which would probably be conclusive upon the supreme court, and compel it to affirm the judgment of the circuit court. The same considerations, nevertheless, which led to the prosecution of the appeal from the sentence of the district court, determined the agents of the Spanish Government not to discontinue the writ of error. All the preparatory steps were properly taken to cause the case in such a state as to be argued at the next supreme court, at which the writ of error was returnable, were consequently taken. The term of the supreme court commenced on the first Monday in August, 1796, at Philadelphia, and on that day, if older business had not been heard. During the term, however, the cause was heard, and the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed.

In a cause removed into the supreme court by a writ of error, that court is not authorized to issue execution to enforce its judgment, but is required to remand the cause to the circuit court, by special mandate, for execution. In the interval between the rendering of judgment by the supreme court, and the presenting of the mandate, to the circuit court, all further proceedings in the cause are necessarily suspended, and nothing can be done but by the courtesy of the unsuccessful party. The circuit court for this district sat on the 5th of September last, which was rather more than a fortnight after the decision of the supreme court; and yet no advantage was taken or attempted to be taken by the counsel of Don Diego Pintado of the suspension which the law created. So far from it that I wrote a letter to Mr. Duponceau, in Philadelphia, the very day I heard the supreme court had given judgment, in which I mentioned that the case was returned, by an order of the supreme court, to the circuit court of New York, and that it was my impression the term was likely to be short; and that I was willing to concur in arrangements for the immediate assessment of the damages which the circuit court might award to the captors; and I added that the supreme court having decided upon the merits of the cause, I wished he would send the captain of the privateer, then in Philadelphia, to me, for the money brought into court, to be paid over to his claimants, for the purpose.

Mr. Duponceau communicated my wish to the captain of the privateer, and he accordingly came on and received the money before the circuit court began; and, in pursuance of arrangements, by mutual consent; the damages were assessed in time to be finally decided upon by the circuit court, and thereupon the proceeding was more than probably brought to a conclusion.

Mr. Duponceau, in his letter to me, which I received before the circuit court began, expressed the surprise that I should have taken the trouble of inquiring of Mr. Duponceau relative to my conduct, he would have been told that the tenor of it throughout the cause was fair, honorable, and liberal. I am possessed of several letters from Mr. Duponceau, in which he emphatically expresses this opinion, and returns me his thanks.

Not having been concerned in the suit against the privateer, I refer you to the attorney of the district for such information respecting it as he may suppose it proper to give you.

With sentiments of the purest esteem, I have the honor to be, &c.

ROBERT TROUP.

Mr. Harrison, District Attorney of New York, to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State.

NEW YORK, December 12, 1796.

Sir:

Mr. Adet's long and extraordinary note of the 15th ultimo could not fail of exciting both surprise and attention. The variety of ill-founded charges which it contained against the most revered and respectable characters in our country, and its general strain of censure upon the wise and impartial measures of Government, had a natural tendency to make the reproaches it contained upon inferior individuals, be considered rather as marks of honorable distinction, than as indicative of disapprobation. Under the circumstances, I was conscious that, as far as I was concerned, in his censures, they were wholly unmerited. I had balanced, with myself, whether it could be proper to add any further statement to those communications respecting the case of La Vengeance, which had already been transmitted to the Government. The case being, at least, one of considerable importance, and as no public man, as far as I was personally concerned, and in deference to the request contained in your letter of the 10th instant, I shall briefly recapitulate the circumstances attending the several suits against the privateer, with the particular reasons that influenced my conduct as prosecutor for the public. I trust that the details I shall give are not only not a portion of those motives by which I was actuated, but also the propriety of the measures which I thought it right to pursue.

About the latter end of June, or beginning of July, 1795, the privateer La Vengeance arrived with a valuable prize in the harbor of New York, at a time when I was absent from the State, upon a tour to the eastward for the recovery of my horse and property. Upon the 20th of June, if I am rightly informed, a suit was commenced, on the admiralty side of the district court, by the Spanish consul, on behalf of the original owner of the prize, upon an allegation that the privateer had been fitted out in the United States. This cause was commenced in my absence, by the advice of Colonel Hamilton and Mr. Troup. I had no participation in the business, nor any knowledge of it, as far as I had been informed, until it was applied to, I should not have thought it incompatible with my station to have been originally concerned for the libellant as the free exercise of profession, in all cases where the United States are not parties, belongs to the district attorneys. Before my return to New York the case had already made some progress; the libel was filed, the prize arrested, and the claim of the libellant was filed by the Spanish consul, who is alleged to be the owner of the privateer.

Mr. Adet's insinuation, therefore, that the prize was arrested in consequence of any exertion or appearance of mine, is totally unfounded, and to be classed with the other groundless representations by the privateer. Upon my return, the counsel of the King of Spain, at New York, complained to me, in my official capacity, of a violation of law on the part of the privateer, in consequence of which a Spanish subject had been injured. This complaint was entitled to attention, both from its own nature and the situation of the complainant. I could not, under no improper bias from any connexion with the prize cause, even if I was capable of being so biased, because, as far as that time, I had no concern in it; and, therefore, Mr. Adet's observation that I acted "without laying aside my office of attorney for the captured," is equally unfounded with the one above noticed.

Upon making the inquiries which I supposed requisite, I found at least a probability that the complaint respecting the privateer was true. This probability arose from what I considered as affording the certainty of material proof: and, therefore, in conformity with my duty, I commenced a prosecution, grounded upon the statute prohibiting the arming of privateers in our ports. In the course of proceeding against the privateer, it was manifest that the cause would be of the United States and that against the privateer. I was the sole counsel, and it was agreed that the evidence taken in the one cause should be used in both. After some time, Colonel Hamilton's numerous engagements rendered it impracticable for him to attend constantly to the examination of witnesses, and as questions arose with respect to the cause against the prize, which did not emerge in that of the privateer, I was engaged to assist as counsel in the prize cause, continuing alone as to everything respecting the public prosecution. This I was ever to have been carried on with the utmost fairness on the part of the United States, and no methods whatever were employed to delay the decision, which, however, was necessarily retarded, in part by the time consumed in examining the numerous witnesses that were called on behalf of the privateer, and, in part, by the calamities suffering New York at that period. Perhaps, too, there were never causes in which more contradictory and irreconcilable evidence was offered, and in which the minds of the auditors were more divided as to the real state of facts. The judge of the district took a considerable time to examine the evidence and form his opinion, and though his decision was in favor of the cause, yet he expressly declared that there was no probable cause for the seizure, which has ever been considered as sufficient to justify a prosecution on the part of the public; and I believe that whoever will examine the mass of jarring evidence that was taken upon this occasion, will accord in that opinion, though he may think that, under all the circumstances, the facts were too decisive to warrant the discovery of a probable cause to institute the suit against the privateer, I united with my associates in recommending the like submission in that cause also. These are all the observations which I think it can be proper to make with respect to the first cause commenced against the privateer.

With respect to the second prosecution, which Mr. Adet says "is principally in question," the facts are these: During the course of the examination in the first cause against the privateer, it appeared that a quantity of arms and ammunition had actually been exported in her from the United States at a time when such exportation was prohibited; and though I had been led to suppose, from some of the testimony, that these had formed a part of the privateer's equipment, yet, as this was contested, I thought it my duty to file another libel or information, stating the exportation as a breach of the prohibited law. Mr. Adet is pleased to say, that "this information was made upon the simple statement of a man, who, as information, has his part of the confiscation." In the first part of this assertion, Mr. Adet is certainly mistaken. The information was founded upon the evidence appearing in the other causes, not upon any declaration made by Mr. Giles; and as Mr. Giles was not the informer, but merely the seizing officer. I do not know that he would have been entitled to any share of the property if confiscated.

After the filing of the second information, it is remarkable that Captain Berard (who could best have contradicted the allegations contained in it, if they were not true) does not appear to have come forward, who could have derived any benefit from information of that description.

In the progress of the cause, however, the exportation of cannon is denied; the muskets attempted at one time to be made fowling pieces, and at another the property of passengers; and the powder, with some ball which accompanied it, is alleged to be but a part of a French privateer, and to have been afterwards replaced; but without explaining whencesoever, in what manner, the supply to the frigate was obtained.

Under these circumstances, the judge of the district pronounced sentence of condemnation against the privateer, founding his decree upon the exportation of the muskets, but without giving any direct opinion as to the powder, which, in my judgment, formed the most important and serious question in the cause; because, if foreign vessels of war might supply the ships or colonies of their nation with ammunition, from their equipments, and again replace the same, probably by purchases within the United States, every prudent and necessary precaution to preserve among us the means of defense, might, at the pleasure of foreigners, be rendered abortive.

The sentence of the district court in this case having been pronounced, an appeal, as stated by Mr. Adet, was interposed by the French consul at New York, and, about this period, a sole of the privateer took place by consent.

If the parties interested supposed that this vessel would sell for no more than a "tenth part of the cost of her armament," it was optional with them to have refused their consent. Mr. Adet knows no other law; it is not at all dependable upon the judge, requiring vessels to be given up upon security, under the circumstances stated. The French consul or his attorneys, and it would have been palpably improper that a privateer, condemned by the sentence of a court of justice, should by any act of an officer of the executive government go into the hands of one of the counsels, and be used to avert against its enemy. Such an act, properly considered, might have been considered as a deviation from strict neutrality, and might have been productive of serious consequences.

In the month of April last, the appeal in the case of the privateer came on to be heard before Judge Chase, in the circuit court of the district of New York. Whatever might have been the expectations of the consul or his attorneys, they did not choose to rest their case upon the evidence taken in the district court, but, upon the first day of the hearing, produced new witnesses. After these had been heard, the argument was commenced for the appellant, and answered on the part of the respondents; but as the judge plainly intimated his opinion, for confirming the former sentence, unless further evidence could be produced, to a particular point, the appellant's counsel applied for, and obtained, a delay of two days; and, in that interval, by some fortunate casuistry, met with a witness, who had only been a few months at New York, and was able to remove every difficulty.

In consequence of this new evidence, Judge Chase thought proper to reverse the sentence of the district court, condemning the privateer; but he not only certified that there was probable cause for the prosecution, but, as in the

No. 85.

CASE OF THE CASSIUS.

The Minister Pleni Potenturty of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, the 22d Thermidor, (August 9, 1795, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:

The corvette le Cassius, belonging to the French republic, is detained in the port of Philadelphia; her captain cited before an American court; and he was, with the vessel and in her, committed to prison, if I had not ordered the consul to give bail for him. The proceedings were carried still further, an attempt was made to arrest him on board his vessel.

It is evident from the capitulation of the motives for his arrest. The result is, that he was taken before a court to answer for an act committed by him on the high seas, as commander of a state vessel.

We should distinguish, sir, between the acts of a private citizen and those of a public agent. The law is universal; private individuals should be amenable for offenses committed by them in a foreign territory, to the courts of the country in which those offenses are committed, and the laws of the country.

But the acts of a man in the character of a public agent are not his own; he represents his Government; and if he conducts so as to excite the complaints of the citizens of another state, or of this State, justice should not be required of him, but of the Government from whom he holds the authority in virtue of which he has done the act complained of.

It is his Government alone that is to judge whether the orders it has given have been well executed or not, and to approve or punish his agent, accused of an improper act towards neutral or allied nations, and to make such reparations as it deems just and equitable. Therefore the complaint should lie in his court before it, either directly, or through the medium of its own Government. Were it otherwise, one Government would become amenable to another; which would reverse the first principles of the rights of nations.

This incontestable principle is corroborated by the 16th article of our treaty, which states literally, " and that more effectual care may be taken for the security of the subjects and inhabitants of both parties, that they suffer no injury by the men of war or privateers of the other party, all the commanders of the ships of His Most Christian Ma-
The command of the corvette Le Cassius cannot be punished but by the French Government, should he merit punishment from the complaints which shall be exhibited to you.

The conduct of France to the United States should not lead them to imagine that she will ever be inattentive to their just complaints; she has been, and always will be, eager to repair, in an ample and complete manner, the slightest injury done to your rights.

What motive then could have led the American courts to arrogate to themselves the cognizance of the conduct of French agents? It gives me pain to disclose the matter to you. Yet, sir, it is not the first case that has presented: General Collot is brought here before a court, as Governor of Guadaloupe. I shall have the honor of addressing an official note to you on this subject.

I return to the affair of the corvette Le Cassius. She is detained here by the arrestation of her captain, which is a violation of the 19th article of our treaty, of which the following is a transcript: "In case the subjects and inhabitants of either party, with their shipping, whether public, and of war, or private, and of merchants, shall be forced, through stress of weather, pursuit of pirates, or enemies, or any other urgent necessity, for seeking of shelter and harbor, to retreat and enter into any of the rivers, bays, roads, or ports, belonging to the other party, they shall be received and treated with all humanity and kindness, and enjoy all friendly protection and help; and they shall be permitted to refresh, at reasonable rates, with victuals and all things needful for the sustenance of their persons, or repairation of their ships, and convenience of their voyage; and they shall no ways be detained or hindered from returning out of the said ports or roads, but may remove and depart when and whether they please, without any let or hindrance."

This arrest is likewise in this case very injurious to the interests of the republic, as the vessel is on a very important mission, and should depart without delay.

I return, sir, to observe to you that the arrest of the captain of the French corvette Le Cassius is a violation of principles and of our treaty. I therefore request—

1st. That you use the proper means for the liberation of the captain of the Cassius, and for removing the seizure of the vessel, unable to the 19th article of the treaty with the United States.

3d. That you have the complaint transferred to the French Government, who will repair the injuries committed, (if he has acted without orders) in pursuance of the 15th article of the same treaty.

The desire which you have more than once testified to me, sir, of rigorously maintaining the observance of our treaties, leaves me no doubt of your disposition to do justice to my demands. I therefore confine myself to request you to accelerate your answer, and the solution of this affair.

Accept, sir, &c.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 24 Thermidor, (11th August, 1795, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:

I have just received the documents you will find enclosed. They relate to the corvette of the republic the Cassius. I had every reason to hope, that the letter which I wrote you on the 29th Thermidor, (9th August, 1795) would have been productive of its full effect. I cannot but consider the arrest of the corvette the Cassius as contrary to the 19th article of the treaty of France with the United States. Consequently, I renew my request to you, to obtain the execution of this article. Besides, I will observe to you that in my last note you ordered me to claim the literal execution of our treaties, and that you will never claim the like of the French republic in vain. I cannot credit the report made to the consul at Philadelphia. I cannot believe that it should be undertaken to take away the sails and apparel of a public ship, and consequently I forbade the consul to give security for the corvette the Cassius. It is for you to judge, sir, what is proper to be done in this affair, which appears to me to be more important than can be well imagined. I will close this letter by observing to you that the Cassius is to sail in six days upon an important errand.

Accept, &c.

No. 87.

We, the officers, sailors, and soldiers, composing the crew of the corvette of the republic the Cassius, commanded by S. B. Davis, lieutenant of the navy, being at the wharf of Philadelphia, certify, that, on the 29th Thermidor, in the 3d year of the French Republic, one and indivisible, (or 11th August, 1795, O. S.) about six o'clock in the morning, there came on board an American, holding in his hand a large piece of paper, which was written upon: he addressed himself to one of us, who was officer of the guard; he spoke in the American language; not understanding him, we directed him to speak to the captain. He therefore addressed himself to the captain, and desired permission to deliver in the present note to you, from which he read to us. We were inclined to think that this was an affront to our national character; we desired to know why he had written his note to you, in the French language. We demanded to know whether he had any business with the American public; and as we thought that he wished to make a complaint against the American nation, we desired to know if he was not thinking of something that was injurious to our country.

He answered us that he did not come of his own accord; that he must do his duty; and since we would not permit him to affix his said paper, that he would render an account of it to his superiors, and that orders would be given to the fleets and ports to facilitate the departure of the corvette and to arrest her, and finally he retired. Of the whole of what is written above I have made a copy of the present report, to be immediately signed by the representative of the French people resident at Philadelphia, to serve and avail as it ought: Done on board the said corvette, the day, month, and year, aforesaid: this we signed after it was read with a loud voice in presence of the crew.

Mr. Pickering to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

The President of the United States having assigned to me a temporary agency in the Department of State, vacant by the resignation of Mr. Randolph, your letter of the 10th instant was consequently put into my hands. I received it on Saturday, the 22d, and have since lost no time in making the inquiries necessary to enable me to return an answer.

The outrage committed towards the republic of France, in the person of your predecessor, by the British ship of war the Africa, being a violation of the neutrality of the United States, and of the laws of nations, engaged the immediate attention of our Government. The case was stated to Mr. Hammond, the British minister; but his departure for London, and the consequent transfer of the duties of his office to Mr. Bond, at present charged des affaires of the British Government, have doubtless occasioned some delay. I can, however, assure you that measures have been taken, and will be strictly pursued, for obtaining every repARATION in our power for any injuries committed, and for asserting the just rights of the French republic, so far as they have been infringed within the jurisdiction of the United States. You shall be duly informed of the result as soon as it shall be ascertained.

On the subject of the corvette le Cassius, which has been arrested at the suit of a citizen of the United States, Mr. Randolph has already informed you that, as long as the question is in the hands of our courts, the Executive cannot withdraw it from them. Of the truth of this principle, I trust no doubt will be entertained. As speedy a decision is the necessary forms of proceeding would admit, you had a right to expect. The answers received to my personal inquiries authorize me to say that, on the part of the court in which the Cassius was libelled, there was no unnecessary delay. Finally, a prohibition to the district court was moved for in the supreme court of the United States, where the motion was supported by such an exhibition of facts as induced the court to grant the prohibition; in consequence of which the Cassius was immediately liberated.

But I have since learned that an information has been filed in the circuit court of the United States against le Cassius, as a vessel illegally armed and equipped within the Jurisdiction of the United States.

I believe it will be contended that le Cassius is the same vessel which departed from the port of Philadelphia in December last, by the name of le Jumeeaux. This vessel (le Jumeeaux) openly resisted, in arms, the authority of our Government, attempted to be enforced against her for a violation of our laws. The circumstances are detailed in the official report of Daniel Robinson, dated January 5, 1796, of which I enclose a copy. This vessel was also understood to be at present commanded by a citizen of the United States, who went out in her ostensibly as a passenger, and who consequently was on board of her when the laws of the United States were forcibly resisted.

Mr. Pickering to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

Department of State, August 25, 1795.

Sir: The President of the United States has assigned to me a temporary agency in the Department of State, vacant by the resignation of Mr. Randolph, your letter of the 10th instant was consequently put into my hands. I received it on Saturday, the 22d, and have since lost no time in making the inquiries necessary to enable me to return an answer.

The outrage committed towards the republic of France, in the person of your predecessor, by the British ship of war the Africa, being a violation of the neutrality of the United States, and of the laws of nations, engaged the immediate attention of our Government. The case was stated to Mr. Hammond, the British minister; but his departure for London, and the consequent transfer of the duties of his office to Mr. Bond, at present charged des affaires of the British Government, have doubtless occasioned some delay. I can, however, assure you that measures have been taken, and will be strictly pursued, for obtaining every reparation in our power for any injuries committed, and for asserting the just rights of the French republic, so far as they have been infringed within the jurisdiction of the United States. You shall be duly informed of the result as soon as it shall be ascertained.

On the subject of the corvette le Cassius, which has been arrested at the suit of a citizen of the United States, Mr. Randolph has already informed you that, as long as the question is in the hands of our courts, the Executive cannot withdraw it from them. Of the truth of this principle, I trust no doubt will be entertained. As speedy a decision is the necessary forms of proceeding would admit, you had a right to expect. The answers received to my personal inquiries authorize me to say that, on the part of the court in which the Cassius was libelled, there was no unnecessary delay. Finally, a prohibition to the district court was moved for in the supreme court of the United States, where the motion was supported by such an exhibition of facts as induced the court to grant the prohibition; in consequence of which the Cassius was immediately liberated.

But I have since learned that an information has been filed in the circuit court of the United States against le Cassius, as a vessel illegally armed and equipped within the jurisdiction of the United States.

I believe it will be contended that le Cassius is the same vessel which departed from the port of Philadelphia in December last, by the name of le Jumeeaux. This vessel (le Jumeeaux) openly resisted, in arms, the authority of our Government, attempted to be enforced against her for a violation of our laws. The circumstances are detailed in the official report of Daniel Robinson, dated January 5, 1796, of which I enclose a copy. This vessel was also understood to be at present commanded by a citizen of the United States, who went out in her ostensibly as a passenger, and who consequently was on board of her when the laws of the United States were forcibly resisted.
Now, admitting the facts to be as here stated, can it excite any surprise that Le Cassius should be subjected to the course of legal process before the courts of the United States? I persuade myself, sir, that your candor will allow them is ground sufficient to institute a legal inquiry, and to acquit our officers and tribunals of even the suspicion of improper interference in this case. You are pleased to advert to the new treaty between the United States and Great Britain. But, even if it were in operation, which is not the case, the assurances which have been given you are certainly just, that it could not weaken our engagements to France. These are secured by the laws of nations, and by an express stipulation in the treaty itself.

I am, sir, &c.

Sir:

Your letter of the 29th ultimo, enclosing a copy of a letter from Mr. Rawle, also one to the Governor of this State, or the commanding officer of the militia, with one to the marshal of this district, I received the same day, at 11 o'clock. The letter to the marshal I immediately forwarded by express, and delivered the other to General Bedford, commanding officer of the militia in this place. He immediately ordered out one hundred and fifty militia, under the command of Major Grantham, who marched to Port Penn with all expedition, as the revenue cutter, under the command of Captain Montgomery, lay there; I also attended, and found, from inquiry, the ships Jumeaux, Captain Rualt, lay opposite the Thram Capps, supposed twenty-five miles below Port Penn. No other vessel could be procured than this cutter. It was thought most advisable to put a captain's command on board of her, with the deputy marshal of my district, on the 1st of January, 1795, they proceeded down the bay. What occurred you will see from the enclosed report, made by my deputy thereon.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE BUSH,
Collector District of Delaware.

No. 92.

Report of David Robinson, acting as Deputy Collector for the District of Delaware, respecting the ship Jumeaux, Captain Rualt.

December 31, 1794.

Agreeable to orders given to me by George Bush, collector of the district of Delaware, I proceeded to Port Penn in the revenue barge; and, on January 1, 1795, went on board the revenue cutter General Green, commanded by Captain James Montgomery, with Thomas Rothwell, the deputy marshal, and Captain Dale of the militia, with about forty men; we proceeded down the bay as far as Bombay Hook, where we found the ship Jumeaux lying at anchor. The cutter then hove to near to the ship. The deputy marshal, Captain Montgomery, Captain Dale, Ensign Van Dyke, and myself, boarded the said ship in the cutter's boat, and found her to have no more guns than what appeared she cleared out from Philadelphia, viz: four on the forecastle, and two swivels; her ports were opened for eighteen guns, with ring-bolts, &c.; and appeared to have about forty men on deck (and it was believed a number more in the hold.) She was deep watered; near five feet high in her waist, and well found. As soon as we boarded her, the commanding officer was asked if the ship was called the Jumeaux, and if his name was Rualt to both of which questions he answered in the affirmative. The marshal and myself made known to Captain Rualt that we were civil officers of the United States, and, by virtue of authority given for that purpose, do now seize the ship Jumeaux, for having violated the laws of the United States, by contravening our neutrality, and demanding of the captain, forthwith, to return with his ship to the port of Wilmington to stand trial. Captain Rualt, after much discussion and provocation, submitted reluctantly, and promised to carry the ship back; and he accordingly weighed anchor and stood up the bay about three miles. Soon after, the pilot, named Joseph Brussell, in consequence (as it appeared) of threats from the crew and the command of Captain Rualt, (as it was in French) bore away the ship, and stood down the river again; Captain Montgomery ordered the pilot to alter his course and stand up the river; he said he dare not act contrary to Captain Rualt's orders; Captain Montgomery took hold of him to send him on board the cutter, upon which several of the crew seized him, and, by force and violence, detained him. Captain Montgomery then hailed the cutter and ordered her to keep close on board; upon which there was an immediate cry of citizens to arms; and the boatwain also piped to arms. Captain Montgomery knocked the pipe out of the boatwain's mouth, for which he was very much insulted; so much so that he laid his hand on his sword; and, after which, we were all treated very rude and insulting. They immediately manned their cannon, and brought them to bear on the cutter, and ran into the round houses of their arms. Captain Rualt said he could not command his men; that they were determined to go to sea, and would not return; night approaching, it was thought most advisable to leave the ship (though the marshal wished to stay all night.) The Captain said he would not sail that night, but would come to an anchor, which he did; we accordingly returned to the cutter; and, not having sufficient force to stand her cannon, without sacrificing a number of good citizens, and perhaps to no effect, we returned to Port Penn about 10 o'clock that night. The next day Major Grantham put as many men on board the revenue cutter as she could carry, and got a small sloop with the remainder of the troops on board, and the revenue barge, with a determination to board the ship; we got under way, and proceeded down the bay, but could not find the ship; she had taken her departure with a fair wind, and was out of sight. We then returned to Port Penn, and the troops were ordered to their respective places to be dismissed.

DAVID ROBINETT.

WILMINGTON, January 5, 1795.

N. B. The boatwain, a Frenchman, and four of the men, took the ship's boat the night after we left the ship, and made their escape. He says they were discovered just as they left the ship; the officers ordered some of the passengers to fire on them, as they said they were all passengers, but none would fire. He reports they had ninety-five men on board, and plenty of ammunition; the ship, he said, got under way about nine or ten o'clock P. M. the night after we left them.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of the Department of War, charged with the Department of State.

PHILADELPHIA, the 1st Vendémiaire, (September 22, 1793, O. S.), 4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:

Possessing full confidence in the sentiments of the Government of the United States, I presented to it my claims with regard to the corvette Le Cassius. If they were urgent, they were founded in justice. In my last letter to Mr. Randolph, I complained of the arrest of the corvette Le Cassius, in violation of our treaties. My complaints were just, and the supreme, prohibiting the district court from pursuing this affair, is an evidence of it. Individual interest had confounded the principles developed in my letter of the twenty-second Thermidor to Mr. Randolph. The supreme court, far from favoring the abuse committed, rendered hommage to them. But, sir, individual interest does not always calculate upon principles: if, in taking a step, it misses the object it proposed to attain, it withdraws, and pursues another route.

The new arrest of the Cassius, perhaps, furnishes us with a proof of this truth. Perhaps the individual who first obtained a man was not the same that has been induced, under the shadow of your laws, to invent the story which compelled the authority to cause the Cassius to be arrested anew. Has Mr. Ketland, who perhaps informed against the corvette Le Cassius, as having armed in the United States, wished only to serve the interest and feelings of his quarter? Is it possible that the sentiments probably dictated the step? His origin; his connections in this city; the desire of serving the country which gave him birth, by paralyzing in your ports a vessel of the republic by embarrassing the American Government between its laws and the treaty; by troubling the harmony which subsists between your country and mine, and which certain people are interested in destroying; these, perhaps, are the true motives of an information colored with the species love of the laws. I am far from insinuating that there are no just suspicions, or that the arrest of the Cassius will not lead to others; but, sir, the government of the United States, after examining the circumstances, it appears to me that his information, whether founded or not, does not change the state of things, and that the violation of our treaty is not less manifest.

I shall not lead you to observe, sir, in order to support the conjectures I have presented to you, that the information of Mr. Ketland was on the very day in which the seizure of the Cassius was taken off. I shall not wait to give you new suppositions, which, perhaps, are not destitute of foundation, but will immediately pass to the proofs in support of my opinion before I inform you of the course which these circumstances oblige me to take. I conceive, sir, that committing the armament of the Cassius in the United States, her seizure is invalid: for this vessel new belongs to the republic; and the nineteenth article of our treaty expressly states, that State vessels may freely enter and sail from the ports of the United States without receiving the least hindrance. The literal meaning of the article then permits the entry of the Cassius. If it were otherwise, the republic would become (in the hypothesis of armament in the United States) responsible for the faults or wrongs of an individual. A vessel, by changing owner, would then always be a security for the faults of her first proprietor. If a frigate of the republic should take an English vessel armed in the United States, and if, from the fortune of war, the Cassius should fall into the hands of these vessels, would they then seize her? Of this conclusion, it is naturally results from the state of things, but it is probable that Mr. Ketland would not draw it if the English flag had weighed on board the Cassius.

In the distribution of ordinary justice, would it not be equitable to seize the arms of a citizen, because before they belonged to the vessel, there had been an attempt to assassinate him? The person is not his weapon, nor is the weapon of the person. If the Cassius touched the United States, she was and is, the Cassius. The vessel which the name of Les Jumeaux, was formerly armed in the port of Philadelphia. But, sir, when this vessel arrived last year at Philadelphia, (the time of the pretended armament) she was armed with four cannon and two swivels. The proofs of this fact must have been in the custom house. It is true, also, that one Guenet was convicted for having attempted to put cannon on board Les Jumeaux, which were intercepted on the way. But this attempt, although punishable in the terms of your laws, is not an armament, and even had it succeeded, it would have been but an augmentation of force, and an augmentation of force is not an armament, and does not, according to the law of 5th June, 1795, occasion the confiscation of the vessel.

How shall we, therefore, qualify the conduct of Mr. Ketland, who could not be ignorant of the law? How shall we avoid seeing in it a formal design to insult the French republic, especially when it is observed that he began the proceeding without cause? I have heard, sir, and his counsel himself has acknowledged, that the vessel does not belong to the United States, that the vessel is not an armed vessel, and that, agreeable to your laws, it belongs exclusively to the district courts to decide in cases of forfeiture. Yet, sir, by the circuit court, which you know has only appellate jurisdiction, that they have had the Cassius seized. This court has but two sessions in a year. It sits but once at Philadelphia. The district court, on the contrary, is always open. If the Cassius had arrived on that day, the vessel has influenced their authority in the present session; it has been seized a short time, but a considerable time elapses before a decision can be obtained in the circuit court; it will not fail, therefore, to declare itself incompetent. Of what importance is it to the men who have promoted the arrest of the Cassius, and who can only enjoy the satisfaction of having indicated the French republic with impunity, and of having abused your laws in order to satisfy the hatred of England?

Whatever reason I had to complain on seeing a discussion relative to the execution of our treaties brought before your ordinary tribunals, when it appertains, according to all established rules among nations, to the Government of the United States, although I should, in such cases, only address myself to the Government of the United States, in order to obtain justice, it being charged with the execution of treaties, yet I did not wish to neglect any means of conciliation in my power, and latterly caused security to be proposed to obtain the reprieve of the vessel, reserving to myself and to you the privilege of determining on an affair unpleasant in all its aspects, by subsequent negotiations.

In these hopes I have been deceived, the security was refused, and the affair is of course abandoned to the decision of the courts. It is well known that delays which nothing could control, at the expenses occasioned to the republic by supporting a vessel which rendered it no service; fearing with just reason, lest the crew (a part of which has been corrupted) should desert after having been so expensive to the republic, I have ordered her to be disarm'd; and from this moment I应当 not applicably to the Government of the United States, under the reservation of referring the matter to the French Government.

I venture to hope, sir, that the Government of the United States will take proper measures to prevent the forces of the republic from being paralyz'd in its ports, and evil minded people from abusing the laws in order to arrest the execution of treaties. If a single circumstance can afford a cause for the ceremony of justice, there is no reason why the first frigate which shall arrive from Europe should not be seized as having armed in the United States. Accept, sir, &c.

P. A. ADET.

No. 94.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of War, charged with the Department of State, to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 1, 1795.

Sir: You have seen that the President of the United States, to maintain the respect due to them, had anticipated towards the British vice consul at Newport, that severity which in your letter of the 10th ult. you considered his offensive conduct required.
In your other letter of the 10th ult. you mention the violation of the law prescribed by the President (conformably with the usage of the European nations) to regulate the sailing of armed vessels of the belligerent Powers, in the case of the British ship the Africa, which pursued the Medusa immediately on her leaving the harbor of Newport. This additional insult and injury by Captain Home, commander of the Africa, was represented in the first description of the facts and circumstances of the said capture to the United States minister in France.

With great pleasure I acknowledge the very different deportment of the officers and company of the French privateer Medusa, of whom not a whisper of complaint has been heard, and who I have reason to believe conducted with exemplary propriety, and respect for the laws. Such would be the conduct of all foreign officers, in neutral ports, if they had the truer notions of the laws of nations, and knew that their own powers were vested in the individuals of their own country, and not ascribed to a vessel as such.

On the 24th ult. I received your letter of that date, and one of the 22d.

On the subject of the privateer La Vengeance and her prize, of which, till the receipt of your letter of the 24th ult., I had no information written to the district attorney of New York, enclosing a copy of your letter, and of the four papers accompanying it, and directing him to furnish me with such information as might be necessary to convince Executive of the United States of the conduct it ought in this case to observe. Here I must rest this matter until his answer shall be received.

With regard to the armed vessel to Cassius, which is the subject of your letter of the 29d ult. I have some observations to make.

In the letter which I had the honor to write you on the 59th of August, I said that any delays which had happened in the district court, on the first process against the Cassius, were not to be ascribed to the court: I may now add that the reason of the delay was that one of the papers was not filed before the proper time. Afterwards exhibited to the supreme court, to obtain the prohibition, this step would doubtless have been unnecessary: the district judge, influenced by the same principles, would probably have dismissed the lien. But that decision did not, I conceive, necessarily involve the present question.

Now that a new action has been commenced against the Cassius, I must repeat what has been already stated, "that as long as the question is in the hands of the courts, the Executive cannot withdraw it from them;" and therefore is not chargeable with suffering a violation of the treaty subsisting between the two republics.

Cassius, under the American flag, a privateer armed vessel, in the port of Philadelphia, is uncontrollable: This was established on the trial of Guenet, who superintended her equipment. You have been informed on this as well as on some other points, both of law and fact. A vessel may be armed, and at the same time be an armed vessel. The reason of this remark applies to Les Jumeaux when she arrived in the port of Philadelphia.

Now, by a law of the United States, to which you refer, a vessel so originally armed and equipped is declared to be liable to confiscation. Whether the subsequent transfer of the property to the French republic will exempt it from this punishment, I do not see, but the question is one to leave to the court; you have only attempt—for it would be the duty of the court to resist its mandate) to remove the question from the judiciary, it would be a violation of the constitution: and you will see immediately that the measure would be as unsafe as unconstitutional.

A fair investigation of the case of the Cassius might lead to this conclusion: that by the law of the United States, she was really liable to confiscation. This admitted, let us suppose her to be now discharged, by the consent of Government, without a trial, and that, in her first cruise, she should take from the enemies of the French republic, prizes of very great value, what would be the consequence? The nations to whom, or to whose subjects, these goods belonged, would demand, and expect to be paid, that value, whatever might be the amount, and it might be immense, by the United States. What also would be the consequence, if the vessel were armed, if there were sufficient force of the vessel with all her equipments, much more than the personal punishment of the agents concerned in fitting her out, was considered by the law as the most effectual guard against the violation of our neutrality. And as to the question of confiscation, you have been taught not to say, "that whether the question respects an individual or a nation, principles are the same, justice is the same."

You have been informed that the circuit court is a tribunal incompetent to take original cognizance of the question of which we are treating that of this the prosecutor could not be ignorant; and thence you see in this measure the design of a formal insult to the French republic. But, sir, the counsel who have told you that such is the law have led you into an error. The question does not respect a confiscation for the breach of the laws of trade, of which the district court has jurisdiction, but for the infliction of a criminal law; for which the penalties are a forfeiture of vessel and equipments, a fine against her, and the persons who equipped and armed her, to fine substantial which may extend to three years; to declare and inflict all which the district court is competent: but the district court can take cognizance of no crimes where the penalties may exceed one hundred dollars, and imprisonment for six months.

You will see the difference between a prosecution grounded on the law of the 5th of June, 1794, when brought against the Cassius, a vessel clearly proved, on a judicial investigation, to have been equipped in violation of that law, and another where a vessel, after coming into "the ports of the United States." No one, it is imagined, would be so unwise, as if he could be so unprincipled, as to attempt an arrest of the latter, and subject himself to the damages recoverable, I presume, for prosecuting a groundless and vexatious suit. Nor can I believe our ministers of justice would be so blind as to discern the entire distinction between the two cases, or that they would not instantly reject the information founded only on pretense, while they as readily admitted the litigation of a question of law, arising on a fact previously established before a judicial tribunal.

After the many assurances which have been given to the ministers of the French republic that the Government of the United States holds itself bound, as well by inclination as by duty, faithfully to observe its treaties, it is unpleasant to receive so frequent intimations of its violating, or suffering them to be violated. There are powerful motives to induce its exact adherence to them, and among these, a regard to its own dignity and reputation, and a love of peace. We are so far distant from them, as to allow ourselves the opportunity of the same conversant in our laws, but who ought to be more correct or less sanguine in their legal opinions. In the case you mention, where, "neglecting no means of conciliation in your power, you directed security to be offered to obtain a release of the vessel," the judge himself, finding no law to warrant the measures, called on the consul to open one of them, more skilful in the laws, or more candid, confessed he knew of none and, therefore, the security was refused.

After this detail, it will be unnecessary for me to declare to you, sir, that the Government of the United States will not knowingly suffer the force of the republic to be paralyzed, or her vessels detained in our ports by ill intentioned people, in abuse of the laws. I am, with great respect, &c.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 15, 1796.

Sir:
In my correspondence with you on the subject of the armed vessel the Cassius, which you claimed as the property of the French republic, I had the honor to inform you that, such was the nature of the prosecution against her, the Executive must wait for the decision of the judiciary power. The court is now sitting in which that decision was expected.

In order to bring the cause to a fair trial, the attorney for the United States, at the preceding court, filed a suggestion stating that the vessel had, in a foreign port, bona fide become the property of the French republic. I have now to request, sir, that, if you have any documents or testimony to support that suggestion, you will be pleased to communicate the same to me, to be put into the hands of the attorney of the United States; or that you would instruct the legal counsel whom you employ for the French republic to make the proper use of those documents and testimony, to substantiate the claim of the republic to the Cassius.

The informants, by whom the prosecution was commenced, will probably press for a trial at this term.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, the 2d Floréal, (23d April, 1796, O. S.), 4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:
You requested, by your letter of the 19th of April, a communication of documents or testimony relative to the purchase, by the French republic, of the corvette the Cassius.

The French republic has not to prove its contracts to foreign courts. I had the honor, sir, in the correspondence which took place between us on the subject of this affair, to declare to you that I knew no relations but with the Executive of the United States, and that, whatever were their interior regulations, I could not, and should not, address myself but to it, in every case for which our reciprocal treaties and conventions have not pointed out a recourse to a particular authority.

The arrest of a State vessel is one of those for which I should address myself only to the American Government; the only fact to be proved is that of the property; and to establish that, sir, my declaration should suffice.

The dignity of nations does not permit their good faith to be brought into question.

I have, therefore, upon the principle of the arrestation of the Cassius, furnished a certificate stating that she was French property, and a State vessel. This certificate is probably among the documents of the prosecution carried on by the Government of the United States, on account of the abandonment which I made to it of the Cassius, under the reservation of the right to her.

However, to comply with your desire, I have the honor to send you a second, more explicit than the former, of which you will make what use you may think proper.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my respect.

The French Republic.
The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States of America declares, to all whom it may concern:

That the corvette le Cassius was a corvette of war belonging to the republic of France; that she was sent to him as such by General Latouche, Governor of St. Domingo; that she was commanded by an officer of the national marine, charged with a particular mission to him, which the arrest of this corvette has interrupted; in a word, that the crew of the said corvette was composed of mariners in the service of the republic, and her marine composed of soldiers and officers of the national army.

Sir:
I duly received your letter and certificate, relative to the property of the armed vessel le Cassius being in the French republic, and have handed the same to the attorney of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania, who has the affair under his management. But he deems it material, to obviate the pleas of the prosecutors, to ascertain the time when she became the property of the republic. If you have any evidence or document to ascertain this fact, I pray you will have the goodness to furnish me with it, as expeditiously as possible. The court will then have before it all the proofs requisite to govern its decision; although what this will be, whether of condemnation or acquittal, I cannot undertake to judge.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Sir:

I have to regret that the fate of the armed vessel Les Juneaux, now called le Cassius, is still in suspense. I requested the Attorney of the United States, Mr. Rawle, to whom the cause had been committed, to inform me of its present situation. Before this abandonment, I complained to you particularly to the last paragraph of that letter, by which you will see it is plainly understood to be the sense of the court, that the regular course of legal investigation not admitting the official certificates with which you were pleased to furnish me, as conclusive proof of the property of the Cassius, will require further evidence in another form.

I am very respectfully, sir, &c.

Sir:

As soon as I received the supplemental certificate of the French minister, which was not till the 26th of April, I gave notice in court that, before the session ended, I should move to have the prayer of my suggestion granted and the information dismissed.

A jury trial then before the court prevented any thing else being done until the 29th, when the counsel for the informant against the Cassius mentioned that they would, on the following day, come forward.

This was then done by requiring me to show the foundation of my suggestion.

I produced part of the correspondence between you and Mr. Adet, and the two certificates of that minister. It was urged by the informant's counsel, that the same proof was necessary to authorize receiving a suggestion as would be to support it on trial, and that as such certificates would not be received in that case, they ought not now to be admitted.

But the court observed that much less was sufficient in one case than in the other.

A regular motion was then made by the informant's counsel, that my suggestion should be dismissed; this I declared myself ready to argue with them immediately; but as we were now at the close of the session, it appeared to the court impossible to get through the business, and it was therefore unavoidably continued till next October.

It appeared, however, so plainly to be the sense of the court that further evidence as to the property of the Cassius would be necessary on a trial of the facts, that I scarcely expect, with the aid of those two certificates only, to succeed.

I have the honor, sir, to be, &c.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States of America to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 15th Prairial, (3 June, 1796, O. S.) 4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:

By abandoning the corvette le Cassius to the United States as I have done, the French republic is become absolutely unconnected in the suit prosecuted on account of her seizure.

The letter written to my predecessor by the Secretary of State, on the 17th November, 1794, on the subject of the Favorite, recognized a principle, according to which I should flatter myself that you would cause this attack by a court, whose forms and authority cannot extend to the French republic, to cease.

The justice you rendered in the affair of the Favorite leads me to think that if I have not received it in the case of the Cassius, it doubtless arises from the effect of some circumstances which changed your situation: I am not to examine them, sir, and it was for that reason that, upon your refusal, I abandoned the vessel.

Now this affair is become yours, I shall give no other answer to the communication you have thought proper to make to her situation, than that a vessel of war never was navigated with any other vouchers than the captain's commission and the roll of the crew; that no other proof has ever been required for establishing the ownership.

Whether she was purchased or built on account of a State, or was taken from an enemy, or, in fine, acquired in any manner whatever, she becomes a public vessel when manned by mariners commissioned by the State.

But what I have the honor of saying to you in this respect, you know, sir, as well as myself, and, notwithstanding the desire of doing what may be agreeable to you, I cannot derogate from the rights of my nation by furnishing other proofs than those which have been given—the captain's commission and my certificate, which was also supercroyatory.

I notify you, sir, that the minister for Foreign Affairs has ordered me to ascertain, with you, the reparation for the injuries and damages arising from the proceedings you have ordered or permitted with respect to this corvette; but I defer treating on this point of right until I shall have received new orders from my Government, in virtue of the abandonment I made to you of this vessel, which they could not have learned until a few days after the departure of my first directions. Accept, sir, &c.

No. 105.

Case of Le Cassius.

In pursuance of the request of the Secretary of State, the attorney for the district of Pennsylvania has the honor to return the following statement, which he hopes will be found correct.

The ship Cassius arrived at the port of Philadelphia in the 4th of August, 1795, from Port de Paix, and as a public ship, of which the count of her force was given to the custom house officers, agreeably to the usual practice. On the 5th of August, Mr. James Yard, a native American citizen, and merchant of Philadelphia, filed a libel against her, in the district court of Pennsylvania, and prayed process of attachment against the vessel, and of arrest against the ship.

The libel stated that a schooner, called the William Lindsay, with a cargo on board, both belonging to the libellant, were captured on a voyage from the Island of St. Thomas to the city of St. Domingo, in the Island of Hispaniola, by the Cassius, under the command of Samuel B. Davis, who pretended an authority from the French republic, but really was a citizen of the United States that the said schooner was carried into Port de Paix, and there wrongfully detained, without compensation to the libellant; and that the Cassius had been illegally fitted out from the port of Philadelphia.

In consequence of this application the vessel was attached, and the captain arrested by the marshal.

Before the return of the process Mr. Adet wrote a letter to Mr. Randolph, then Secretary of State, (dated 29th Thermidor, 3d year of the republic, answering to the 9th of August) complaining of the detention and arrest; referring to the 15th and 19th articles of the treaty with France, and requesting the Secretary of State, 1st, to take the necessary measures to restore the captain to his liberty, and release the vessel; and, 2d, to cause the complaint to be referred to the French Government, which would repair the injury if the captain had acted without orders.

About the same time complaints were made on the part of the British resident, earnestly urging that the Cassius, having been, as alleged, illegally fitted out, should be detained, and that Government would enforce the laws against both the vessel and the captain, as an American citizen holding a commission under one of the belligerent Powers. On these opposing pretensions the attorney of the district of Pennsylvania was personally consulted by Mr. Ran dolph. It became obvious necessary to determine, in the first place, and as speedily as possible, what the law required, before the political obligations, which might arise from the occasion, could be considered. It appeared to the district attorney that, "if the French Government had made a fair and unsuspecting acquisition of the property of a vessel, then lying in their own ports, and, out of the reach of the jurisdiction of the United States, a cause of forfeiture previously existing, but unknown at the time of the purchase, could not, at a future day, revive, so as to subject the same vessel, still remaining the property of a sovereign nation, to the process of our courts."

"Penal laws are strictly local, and affect only what they can reach."

"The change of property, in a foreign country, is therefore a question; and the question is, the effect of the purchase, made by an individual, the right acquired by a foreign sovereign appears, on the principles of national policy, to be superior to the pre-existing right of forfeiture."

A sovereign is not amenable to the tribunals of another.

What cannot be done directly ought not to be done indirectly.

Process of information and seizure indirectly brings the sovereign to submit to the tribunal, or to abandon the property. There is, indeed, little difference between the direct and indirect mode of effectuating this event, since an attachment of some movable article must be, in general, the mode of compelling the appearance of a foreign sovereign. Inconceivable evils would result from the allowance of the first experiment. An impudent individual might, at least, endeavor to detain a whole squadron by process, which it would be just in the French to demand that the public power of a country in bondage should not, in respect to the charge against Captain Davis, the district attorney was of opinion that an acceptance and exercise of a foreign sovereign, within the territory and jurisdiction of the United States, were necessary to constitute an offence within the act of Congress, entitled " An act in addition to the act for punishing certain crimes and offences against the United States." That, although, by coming in the port of Philadelphia, with the command of the Cassius, the exercise of the commission was complete, yet the acceptance of it appearing to have taken place in a foreign country, he could not be deemed liable to prosecution.

The foregoing opinions being verbally communicated to Mr. Randolph, produced a request on his part that the speciest method for obtaining a decision of the question should be adopted.

In the mean time some propositions for an amicable adjustment of the complaint of Mr. Yard afforded a prospect of another termination of the controversy; but, these failing, the district attorney, in obedience to his instructions, prepared a suggestion to the district court, a copy of which will be found in the annexed exemplification of the record, and which he exhibited in court on the 21st of August, where it was received and filed.

This mode of proceeding being somewhat novel, may require an explanation.

This copy of the record was submitted to the circuit court, and called, as it appeared, with no very clear conception of the constitutional powers of the Executive, for a direct interference to annul the judicial proceedings.

A claim in the name and behalf of the French nation, or a plea in the same name and behalf, to the jurisdiction of the court, would have been consistent with the technical forms of proceeding; but the district attorney had no authority to use their name; he had no warrant of authority to produce from them if required. The United States, however, had an interest in the question; and, recurring to authorities; where the interests of third parties had been effectually before even courts of common law, he ventured, as a more solemn form of motion, to state to a court of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, the interest which he represented, and the objections he had to urge, in the form above mentioned. On the same day a plea to the jurisdiction of the court was filed in the name of Samuel B. Davis, by counsel employed for him. The intention of doing this had not been communicated, or the suggestion would have been deemed unnecessary; but, so far from interfering with, they tended to support each other; both for the same purpose remained upon the face of the court, in course to be answered on the next court day.

In the mean time, the counsel employed for Captain Davis applied to the supreme court of the United States, then in session, for a prohibition to the district court; which was granted upon principles which will be found to coincide with those which had directed the conduct of the district attorney; a short statement of which is inserted in the writ of habeas corpus contained in the record annexed: and thus the proceedings in the district court were terminated. In reviewing the case to this point, it obviously appears that the conduct of Government was justifiable and consistent; that the obligations of the treaty with France were faithfully obeyed, by taking every constitutional method in aid of the requisitions of the French minister that the occasion could reasonably admit, without evasion or delay, and that nothing but the existence of a controlling power over the courts of justice, wisely excluded from our constitution, although it seems to be supposed in the complaint, could produce favorable conclusions.

The business now assumed a new aspect. On the 24th August, Mr. John Ketland, a citizen of the United States, filed an information in the circuit court, founded upon the act of 5th June, 1794, entitled “An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States” and having made oath to the truth of his allegations before one of the judges of the supreme court, obtained an order to attach the Cassius. It is necessarily to observe, that the Government of the United States had no share in this transaction. Where a forfeiture is given by law, as in the present instance, to be appropriated one-half to the informer and the other half to the public, any individual has a legal right to commence and prosecute, and recover his share or defeat the suit. The moiety due, upon conviction, to the public, may be remitted; but the moiety due to the informer, is subject only to his own will.

It therefore ensued, that the part to be taken by the Government of the United States, on this new occurrence, was precisely another, and that which attended the suit in the district court. And directions were given accordingly to implicate the conduct of the judge of the supreme court who signed the order to the marshal, evidences a very moderate share of information. To administer the oath, and issue the order required, were as precisely his duty, as it was to repel the attempt to obtain the liberation of the vessel previous to the meeting of the court.

Mr. Adet, on the 1st of September, (not on the 1st of August, as stated in his note) renewed his complaints to the Secretary of State, urging, among other things, that the suit had now been carried to an incompetent tribunal. It certainly was not in course for any other public officer than the judges of the courts to decide upon the doubtful jurisdiction of the circuit court in this instance.

A judicial system, in some respects perfectly new, in the present instance yet untried, required a regular and professional discussion before the point could be determined. Two gentlemen, of eminence at the bar, concerned for Mr. Adet’s rights, appeared before the circuit court, and were authorized to present a memorial to the executive authority, to assert security to be given for the Cassius, to enable her to proceed upon her voyage, was, on consideration, rejected; because, if it should afterwards be made to appear that the ship had been illegally fitted out in a port of the United States, other nations, who might suffer by her warlike operations, would have just cause to claim a compensation from the United States, and this, independent of the ground already stated in considering the subject of forfeiture; because the request was believed to be without a precedent; and because it would, in effect, have been assuming the judicial power of determining on important questions in view. The executive power was therefore restrained from affording further aid to the efforts of Mr. Adet, until the court should meet at Yorktown, the 11th October. On the 31st September, Mr. Adet, made his further formal efforts to signify to the Secretary of State that he had caused the Cassius to be dismantled, and abandoned her to the Government of the United States.

From this time, therefore, the particular motives to urgency on account of the mission with which the Cassius was said to be charged, seemed to have ceased. But the efforts to obtain a discharge of the suit were not on that account relaxed.

At the meeting of the circuit court at Yorktown, the district attorney filed a suggestion similar to that used in the district court.

The multiplicity of criminal business prevented his obtaining a decision, but it had the effect of suspending the progress of the information. The cause was necessarily continued till April session of 1796.

A letter from the district attorney to the Secretary of State, dated May 26th, 1796, relates the proceedings of that April session, which were somewhat delayed by a reluctance on the part of Mr. Adet to furnish sufficient documents to establish the property of the Cassius. A copy of the letter, as a proper continuation of the narrative, is here inserted, viz:

May 26, 1796.

This was then done by requesting me to show the foundation of my suggestion. I produced part of the correspondence between you and Mr. Adet, and the two certificates of that which attended the suit in the district court, appropriated the judicature of the circuit court, over which I preside, and the fact of the receiving a suggestion as would be to support it on a trial, and that, as such certificates would not be receivable in that case, so they ought not now to be received. But the court observed that much less was sufficient in one case than in the other. The incontestable to the two papers under whose authority their commission is in fact, and that, on the 8th May, 1796, Samuel B. The prohibition recites that, by the law of nations, and the treaties between the United States and France, the trial of prizes taken without the jurisdiction of the United States, and brought into the jurisdiction of France for adjudication, by the vessels of war of the latter, and all questions incidental to it, belong exclusively to the judiciary establishments of the latter; that consequently, its vessels of war and their officers are not liable to process of our courts, upon that which attended the suit in the district court, appropriated the judicature of the circuit court, over which I preside, and the fact of the receiving a suggestion as would be to support it on a trial, and that, as such certificates would not be receivable in that case, so they ought not now to be received. The incontestable to the two papers under whose authority their commission is in fact, and that, on the 8th May, 1796, Samuel B. Davis was a lieutenant of ships in the French navy, and commander of the corvette called the Cassius, having a lawful commission; that James Yard, of the city of Philadelphia, merchant, had caused the said Davis and the said corvette to be arrested, to answer to his libel against them filed in the district court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania, in which he alleged that, on the said 20th of May, the said Davis, with whom he had contracted, and as her commander, had captured, on the high seas, a schooner belonging to the said ship, called the Cassius, on the said 20th day of May, in the year aforesaid, being the time when the said libellant charged that the said schooner, William Lansid, was taken and detained, in manner by him alleged, and, also, at the time of her being arrested and attached by the marshal of the district aforesaid, at the suit of the said libellant, the property of, and belonging to, the French republic, a sovereign nation, in peace, amity, and alliance, with the said United States, and this is ready, and offers to verify: wherefore the said ship, the Cassius, being the property of, and belonging to, the French republic, cannot, by law, be rendered liable to civil process in the courts of the United States, at the suit of individually and the said United States being answerable to foreign nations for the due observance of treaties with them subsisting, and of the principles and usages of the laws of nations in respect to ships and other property belonging, and unduly seized, arrested, or attached, under color of legal process, within the territory of the said United States, and the peace and interests of the United States being deeply involved therein, the said attorney, acting in the behalf aforesaid, prays this honorable court, that the said ship the Cassius, may, by the sentence and decree of this honorable court, be released and discharged from the attachment and arrest aforesaid, and that the said libel, so far as the same relates to the said ship the Cassius, may be dismissed, with costs and such further damages as the court may adjudge. For their said wrongful arrest and attachment.

And the aforesaid Samuel B. Davis may be discharged from arrest.

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: I have already had the pleasure to inform you, verbally, of the interest which the committee of public safety of the National Convention has taken, in due season, in the truly unhappy situation of your commerce in the Mediterranean. I now fulfil the duty imposed on me by the Government, by calling to your recollection, in writing, these previous steps which are to be taken by our agent with the Decy of Algiers, for repressing this new manoeuvre of the British administration, which has put the finishing stroke to its proofs of malevolence towards free people. The despatch of the minister communicating this measure to me, is dated the 5th of January, and did not come to my hands till fifteen days ago; I do not yet know by what route; I could have wished it had been less tardy in coming to me, that I might sooner have fulfilled the agreeable task of proving to you, by facts, the protestations of friendship of which I have the honor to assure you, on the part of France.

The information which I shall receive from Europe, in a little time, will, doubtless, possess me of the success of those negotiations, which were to have been opened in January last. If the situation of your affairs is yet such with respect to that barbarous regency, as that our interventour may be of some utility, I pray you to invite the President in cause to be communicated to me the means that he will join to those of the committee of public safety, for the greatest success of the measures already taken. It is in virtue of the express request of the minister, that I solicit of the President some communication on this subject: I shall be satisfied to be able to transmit it by a very early conveyance, which I am now preparing for France. Accept my esteem.

J. H. FAUCHET.

FOREIGN RELATIONS. [1797.]

Your other letter, of the 4th of June, is a powerful demonstration of the interest which the republic of France takes in our welfare. I will frankly communicate to you our measures and expectations with regard to Algiers; but as you will so soon receive the detail of those measures which your Government have pursued in our behalf, and, after the rising of Congress, some new arrangements will probably be adopted by the Executive, it will be better, perhaps, to postpone our interview on this matter until the intelligence which you further expect shall arrive.

I have the honor, sir, to be, &c.

Sir:

I herewith enclose to you a literal copy of the part of my instructions relative to a new commercial treaty, and a new consular convention, to be entered into between France and the United States. Honesty, justice, the interest of the two nations, and the most exact reciprocity, are the basis which the French republic adopts in her treaties of friendship. "The minister shall prepare with the American Government the means and arrangement of a new consular convention, and of a new commercial treaty, and he shall communicate his negotiation on this subject to the committee of public safety. This negotiation shall be built upon the different decrees of the National Convention passed on this subject. The object of the new treaty shall be to found the commercial relations of the two republics upon some points more reciprocally advantageous, and more clearly worded than that of 1778, and the object of the consular convention to assure the full and complete execution of this treaty."

Sir:

I had the honor of receiving your letter of yesterday, covering an extract from your instructions relative to a new treaty of commerce, and a new consular convention. Even before we are fully informed of the extent of the different decrees of the National Convention upon which your propositions are to be founded, I do not hesitate to declare to you our readiness to open a negotiation with you upon these two subjects. It would seem from your instructions, that you have no power to conclude or sign any new compact. If I misjudge the nature of your authority, you will be pleased to correct me.

I must also beg the favor of you to communicate to me the dates of those decrees to which your instructions refer. Perhaps I may be possessed of the whole, or most of them. In that case, copies will be asked of none but those which are not in the office of this Department. Your answer to this letter will enable me to offer to your consideration some arrangements which may facilitate the discussions.

Permit me, however, to request, on this first opportunity of business, that when you give the dates of the French calendar, you will be so obliging as to add the dates of our own. Experience has shown that mistakes and delays have arisen in our office from the want of familiarity with the French calendar.

It is with great reluctance that I trouble you so often upon the same subject. I cannot entertain a doubt that, but for your indisposition, you would before now have answered my letter on the new negotiation, as you were obliging enough to promise me in conversation several times. But the President intending to leave this city on Tuesday morning, and it being requisite, as I have had the honor of stating to you, that I should receive his instructions before his departure, I will thank you to enable me to present to him the subject of our negotiation as fully as your overtures will permit. If I discover some anxiety, I beg you to impel it to the hope that this business will result in our mutual honor, by proving that, while we each labor for the interest of our respective nations, we can promote the prosperity of both.

I have the honor to be, &c.

P. A. Adet presents his compliments to Mr. Randolph, and sends him the letter which he should have addressed to him some days ago, if the fever he is afflicted with had permitted him to attend to business. Mr. Randolph will find with that letter a part of P. A. Adet's instructions relative to the articles of the treaty which the French Government has instructed him to stipulate positively; the other articles, founded on reciprocal advantages, are left to the course of the negotiation which is to establish them.

P. A. Adet will have the honor of seeing Mr. Randolph as soon as his health will permit.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States of America to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

20th Messidor, 3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

(July 8, 1795, O. S.)

Sir: I have received the letter you did me the honor to write to me dated the 1st July. I have never doubted the attachment of the United States for the French republic, and the reply you made to my letter of the 30th June is a proof of it. You request of me, in that letter, some information, which I hasten to give you.

I neither know nor possess any other decree, relative to the new negotiation to be opened between France and the United States, than that of the 9th of February, 1793, communicated to you by citizen Genet; and, as it must be in the office of your Department, I conceive it will be useless for me to send it.

My instructions empower me to prepare the plans of a new consular convention, and of a new commercial treaty. After my Government and that of the United States shall have approved of the plans, the sending of full powers for the signature is but a formality which is easily fulfilled. This step appeared proper, to avoid a number of inconveniences at the time of the ratification of the treaty.

I will fulfill the desire expressed in the last paragraph of your letter, and shall take care to add, in all my despatches, the date of your calendar to that of the French.

Accept, sir, &c.

Extract from the instructions given by the French Government to citizen Adet.

"The minister plenipotentiary shall stipulate positively, and without reserve, the reciprocal exemption from the tonnage duty so necessary to our mercantile marine. This exemption, implicitly assured in the parts of the United States by the 4th and 5th articles of our commercial treaty, has never been executed therein, and, since the organization of their new government, a very burthensome tonnage duty has been rigorously exacted on our merchant vessels; even in 1793, a severity and an injustice were used, which the American Government should not have suffered. But the respective naturalization of the French and American citizens, proposed by Mr. Jefferson, and desired by the French nation, will facilitate this stipulation of a reciprocal exemption from tonnage, and render it less offensive to the Powers, who, in virtue of treaties, might claim a participation in the same advantages; as the casus federalis would, by this stipulation be changed in this respect."

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 13, 1795.

Sir: I understand, by the letter which I had the honor of receiving from you in the evening of yesterday, that "your instructions give you power only to prepare the draught of a new consular convention, and a new treaty of commerce." Notwithstanding the formality of this procedure, the President of the United States has directed me to meet you.

But I am prevented, sir, from proposing to you a time, place, and arrangement, for our conversations, by a fear of incommoding you in your present indisposition. Permit me, therefore, to expect that, as soon as your health will suffer you to attend to this subject, you will be so good as to inform me.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 16, 1795.

Sir: After acknowledging your letter of the 14th instant,* which I had the honor of receiving yesterday, I take the liberty of proposing the following plan of procedure in the discussions now commencing between us.

As you are not clothed with any very formal authority upon this subject, the President of the United States has thought it proper to place me upon the same and no other footing. Hence we are both to be considered as committees, delivering our own sentiments to each other; and, after comparing them, reporting our opinions to our respective Governments; which, by these means, will remain mutually uncompromitted, until the system is modified so as to meet their approbation.

So various and weighty is the business which now presses upon my attention, that I could not rely upon my own memory, nor upon my own accuracy, were not the interchange of our thoughts to be made on paper. I beg leave, therefore, to suggest, that we conduct the discussion in this way, except when it shall appear to either of us more expedient to have an interview on some particular difficulty. Our letters shall constitute no part of a formal report to our Governments; and shall be liable to be recalled, or changed, as each party pleases; unless, on the close of the transaction, we shall agree to annex them to any draught which may be prepared.

Assuring you, sir, that no unnecessary procrastination shall be found in me, I submit to your consideration this arrangement: 1st. That you state the parts of the subsisting treaty which you wish to be abolished; 2d. Those parts which you wish to be corrected; and 3d. Any additions which seem to you desirable. These may be examined, either separately or conjointly, as shall be most agreeable to you, and, if you prefer stating one class at a time, I shall not object. Indeed, if any other arrangement shall strike you more favorably, I have too little predilection for my own to hesitate at the adoption of a better.

This transaction is so momentous that too much time cannot be well spent upon it; and it will facilitate my other duties, could I enter into it so early as to afford full opportunity for reflection.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

SIR:—On the 6th, I received the letter of that date, which you addressed to me in answer to the observations I made to you on the treaty concluded between the United States and Great Britain. I observed, had not my health, which has always been unstable since my arrival in this country, obliged me to abstain from business for upwards of fifteen days. I shall transmit it to the French Government, together with my observations and the treaty. In such important circumstances, it is exclusively the province of my Government to judge, and I cannot permit myself to decide at all, and still less to decide at all.

In a few days I shall have the honor of seeing you, and of taking the necessary measures, in order to commence the business relative to the digesting of the new treaty and new consular convention.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 26th Messidor, (14th July, 1795, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR:—I have the honor to transmit to you an official decree of the committee of public safety of the 14th Nivose, in the 3d year of the French republic, which you have seen in the newspapers, and which you communicated to my predecessor, citizen Fauchet, in your letter of the 14th of last Nivose.

This decree revokes the 4th article of that of 26th Brumaire, in the same year, a copy of which I have also the honor to transmit to you.

You will see, sir, in both, the undisguised disposition and sincere desire of the French Government religiously to observe the engagements it has contracted with its allies, and its readiness to redress infractions which have never been taken place but from the impulsion of circumstances.

That of the 14th Nivose will convince you particularly of the purity of motives and respect for principles which animate the National Convention and its committees. It was not produced by representations from the neutral Governments in their subjects, but the result of a rigid examination of the extant or expired contracts with our allies.

By this article, the merchandises belonging to Powers at enmity with the French republic, laden on board of neutral vessels, are declared free.

It is amidst this triumphs that the republic loves to give this striking mark of her fidelity. Victorious France knows no other concern than that of justice—no other diplomatic language than that of truth.

As for myself, sir, who have the honor of representing her near your Government, I esteem myself happy in having the superintendent of the execution of these measures of justice; and if, contrary to my expectation, they should experience any violations by the vessels which come near your latitudes, you will see me anticipate your complaints by honestly probing them to the bottom, and redressing them with a zeal equal to that with which you might be animated yourself.

Accept, sir, &c. P. A. ADET.

Extract from the Register of the Decrees of the Committee of Public Safety of the National Convention, of the 14th Nivose, 3d year of the French republic one and indivisible.

The committee of public safety, considering that the 3d article of the treaty of commerce between France and the United States of America, of the 6th of February, 1778, stipulates formally—

1st. That the French and Americans may navigate in full security with their vessels, without any exception being made on account of the proprietors of the merchandises laden in those vessels, from whatever port they come, and although the Power for which they are destined, is, or may be, an enemy of the contracting nations; that they may, in like manner, navigate in full security with their vessels and merchandises, and frequent the places, ports, and harbors, of Powers, enemies of the two contracting nations, or of one of them, and carry on commerce not only from an enemy's to a neutral port, but from one neutral port to another:

2d. That free vessels shall make free goods; and every thing which shall be found on board of vessels belonging to the citizens of one of the contracting nations, shall be judged free, if even the lading should belong in whole, or in part, to the enemies of either; contraband articles being always excepted:

3d. That this same freedom shall be extended to the persons who may be on board of the free vessels, should they even be enemies of one of the two contracting nations; and that consequently those persons cannot be taken from on board of such vessels, unless they be military characters and actually in the service of the enemy: Consider ing that the crimes of England have given to the war of defense against liberty a character of injustice and atrocity unexampled in history, the National Convention found itself obliged, in using the right of reprisal, to decree, on the 9th of May, 1793, that vessels of war and French privateers should arrest, and conduct into the ports of the republic, the neutral vessels which should be found laden, in whole or in part, either with produce belonging to neutral nations, and destined for enemies' ports, or with merchandises the property of enemies; but that, soon after, on the 1st of July, 1793, the National Convention hastened to re-establish, in all their vigor, the dispositions above recited of the treaty, of the 6th of February, 1778; that in fact it has been revoked by that of the 27th of the same month, so far as relates to the produce and merchandises belonging to the enemy, nor has it been, since the 13th of this month, all the agents of the republic, all the commandants of the armed forces, and all officers, civil and military, to cause to be respected and observed, in every particular, the treaties uniting France to the neutral Powers of the ancient continent, and to the United States; that, by the same article, an infringement of those treaties is forbidden, and that all acts which may be contrary thereto are annulled:

Considering that since, and notwithstanding the affectation with which that cabinet continues daily to insult the rights of nations, and to violate the neutrality of non-belligerent Powers, in causing to be seized their vessels laden with merchandises destined for France, the National Convention enjoined, by the seventh article of the law of the 13th of this month, all the agents of the republic, all the commandants of the armed forces, and all officers, civil and military, to cause to be respected and observed, in every particular, the treaties uniting France to the neutral Powers of the ancient continent, and to the United States; that, by the same article, an infringement of those treaties is forbidden, and that all acts which may be contrary thereto are annulled.

Considering that it is of importance to make known to the world this grand act of honesty and justice, and speedily to do away every pretext which malevolence might employ, either for obstructing or retarding its effect, or perverting the same to the prejudice of the republic, it is decreed:

AR. 1. The colonial and marine commissioners shall notify, without delay, all the commandants of the naval armies, divisions, squadrons, fleets, or vessels, of the article of the law of the 15th of this month, cited above; and inform them, in a summary manner, of the provisions of the decree of the committee of public safety, of finances, and of commerce and supplies, of the 25th Brumaire last, (15th November) which authorized the seizure of merchandises belonging to enemy Powers, until they should have decreed the disposal of such merchandises laden on board of neutral vessels.

AR. 2. Merchandises, even of neutral nations, denominat ed contraband, or prohibited, shall continue to be liable to seizure.

AR. 3. The articles comprised under the name of prohibited or contraband merchandises, are arms, instruments, and warlike stores of whatsoever kind they may be, their harness, and all kinds of effects, produce, or merchandises, destined for an enemy's port, actually besieged, blockaded, or invested.

AR. 4. The commissioners for exterior relations shall transmit the present decree to the agents of the republic near theを通ued, or neutral Governments, with orders to communicate it to them.

AR. 5. The present decree shall be inserted in the bulletin of the laws.

1st. Merchandises belonging to the French republic, until these Powers shall have declared free and not seizable French merchandises laden on board of neutral vessels.

2d. Also neutral merchandises, denominat ed contraband or prohibited, under the name of prohibited or contraband merchandises, are included arms, ammunition, and warlike instruments of every kind, provision or merchand ise, destined for an enemy's port, actually besieged, blockaded, or invested.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States of America to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of the Department of War of the United States, charged with the Department of State.

PHILADELPHIA, the 7th Vendémiaire, (30th Sept. 1795, O. S.) 4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR: The public papers announce, in every quarter, that the English, in contempt of the law of nations, arrest and seize American vessels laden with provisions for the ports of France. Although this事实 is not authentically vouch Executed to me, I cannot doubt it, since no one has ever contradicted any of the numerous assertions which had any relation to it. If the interests of my country were not deeply compromitted by the measures which the English Government has taken with regard to your commerce, I should have remained silent. I know that it is not for me to judge of circumstances in which the glory of the United States, the honor of their flag, the liberty of their commerce, may be outraged. I know, therefore, that it is the province of their Government alone to decide and to act, and that that Government would justly have reason to be hurt at the representations of a foreign minister, from his information and the nature of things, on an object which interested the American nation, or its Government alone; but, sir, if at the present moment the interests of the United States are in question, those of France are also, and I should retract my duty if I were for a moment to forget them.

It is not the first time that the English have given to the world the scandalous spectacle of their contempt for the rights of nations. It is not the first time that the belligerent Governments had occasion to complain, and has been apprehensive of seeing their neutrality compromitted. So long ago as 1793, the cabinet of St. James ordered the arrestation and seizure of American vessels laden for the ports of France. This conduct, which violated every principle, and which injured the interests of the republic, obliged the convention to imitate it; but its views were very different from those of the British Government, as, by that means, she sought to support, though indirectly, the rights of neutral nations; she ought to be entirely justified by the 5th article of the decree, declaring, that it shall cease to have effect when the combined Powers shall have acknowledged, agreeably to the law of nations, provisions, found on board neutral vessels, as not liable to seizure. Although the censured Powers are far from admitting these principles, sacred to every honest Government, the National Convention has not thought proper longer to follow their example, and the committee of public safety has exhibited in its arrest of the fourteenth last Nivose, its love for justice, and the sentiments of France for the United States.

You know, sir, as well as I do, that the war which exists between two Powers, cannot alter, in any manner, the rights of the United States, who wish to remain at peace; and that their relations with those belligerent Powers are the same as before the declaration of war. These conditions constitute the state of neutrality. As soon as the relations change—when one of the belligerent Powers is more favored than another by the State which has not taken part in the war, the nationality of that State ceases to exist. It, therefore, is one of the belligerent States seeks to obtain from the neutral nation an advantage not enjoyed by its enemy, the neutral State should, if she wish to remain at peace, oppose its pretensions by all the means in her power, or she should, in order to keep the balance in equilib rium between both enemies, allow them to participate in the same advantages, if her interests permit: otherwise that nation would discover a partiality which cannot accord with the state of neutrality. These are evident truths, and are generally received.

Besides, in every war, neutral nations have armed in defense of their neutrality; and we accordingly see, at the present moment, the Directory sending detachments for the purpose of protecting their commerce and supporting their neutrality; likewise did the United States in 1793, strongly complain against the arrestation of their vessels by the ships of war of the English. Permit me, sir, to cite here, in support of this assertion, the following lines from a letter of Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Pinckney, dated 7th December, 1793. "This act, too, tends directly to draw us from the state of peace, in which we are wishing to remain. It is an essential character of neutrality, to furnish no aids (not stipulated by treaty) to one party, which we are not equally ready to furnish to the other. If we permit corn to be sent to Great Britain and her friends, we are equally bound to permit it to France. To restrain it, would be a partiality which might lead to war with France, and between restraining it ourselves, and permitting her enemies to restrain it unrightfully, is no difference. She would consider this a mere pretext, of which she would not be the dupe, and on what honorable ground could we otherwise explain it? Thus we should see ourselves plunged, by this unauthorized act of Great Britain, into a war, with which we..."
muddle not, and which we wish to avoid, if justice to all parties, and from all parties, will enable us to avoid it. In the case, where we found ourselves obliged, by treaty, to withhold from the enemies of France the right of arming in our ports, we thought ourselves in justice bound to withhold the same right from France also, and we did it. Were we to withhold from her, supplies of provisions, we should, in like manner, be bound to withhold them from her enemies also, and thus shut to ourselves all the ports of Europe, where corn is in demand, or make ourselves parties in the war. This is a dilemma, which Great Britain has no right to force upon us, and for which no pretext can be found in any part of our conduct. She may, indeed, feel the desire of starving an enemy nation; but she can have no right of doing it at our loss, nor of making us the instrument of it.

This quotation I conceive is the development of the principles which I have laid down; and when it contains the sentiments and opinion of the American Government itself, it would be unnecessary to enter into an ulterior discussion.

It cannot now, therefore, be doubted by any man, who will discard prejudices, love, hatred, and, in a word, all the passions which lead the judgment astray, that the French republic have a right to complain, if the American Government suffer the English to interrupt the commercial relations which exist between her and the United States: if, by a perfidious condensation, it permitted the English to violate a right which it ought to defend for its honor and its interest; if, under the cloak of neutrality, it presented to England a pernicious to cut the throat of its faithful ally; if, in fine, participating in the tyrannic and homicidal rage of Great Britain, it concurred to plunge the French people into the horrors of famine.

But I am convinced this will not be the case. The American Government is too much attached to the laws of an exact neutrality it knows too well that the cause of freemen is interwoven with that of France, to allow the English to usurp a right injurious to the interests of the republic.

It is under this conviction that I have written to you this letter, persuaded that it is perhaps superfluous to address to you these representations. I do not doubt but that the American Government will prove to all Europe its intention of maintaining the most exact neutrality with regard to the belligerent Powers; that it will compel England no longer to violate the rights of nations; and that it will henceforward relieve France from the unpleasantness of addressing new complaints on this subject.

Accept, sir, &c.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the republic of France near the United States to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 9th Germinal, (March 29, 1796, O. S.)

4th year of the republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: On the 7th Vendemiaire last, I had the honor of writing to you, relative to the arrest of American vessels laden with provisions for France. I flattered myself with receiving from you an answer which might prove to my Government that the United States, faithful to the neutrality which they have imposed on themselves, neglect no means of repressing every infringement made on it by any of the belligerent parties to the detriment of its enemy.

Near six months ago, I sent a copy of my representation to my Government, and at the expiration of that term I was under the necessity of informing it that I still expected a solution of this important object.

Now, sir, I complain upon a point infinitely more essential, and which does not to me appear susceptible of delay: I mean the impressments exercised by the English on board of American vessels.

For some time, each successive vessel arriving from the colonies brings, in this respect, more frightful accounts than the former, and I have just received from the vice consul at Alexandria, a letter of the 4th Germinal, relative to the impressment used by the English ship Swift, and the frigate Success, upon the crew of the brig Fair Columbian, from Alexandria, freighted, on account of the English, by Messrs. Patterson and Taylor.

It is not then sufficient for the English to purchase a number of vessels, which they load with all sorts of provisions; to navigate their vessels under your flag; to carry horses for remounting the cavalry; to enrol grooms for this military service; but they must also take by force the American crews, in order to make them serve on board their vessels of war, to the ruin of our colonies.

You must be sensible, sir, that simple and ordinary measures are insufficient in such circumstances. We have neither the right nor desire of interfering in your interior administration, but, when hostilities are in question, France may request an account of the measures you have taken for putting a stop to them, and repairing the damage they already have caused, or may hereafter do.

Permit me, sir, to repeat to you, they should be prompt and efficacious. Would representations to the court of London, which, in the course of six months, perhaps, might put a stop to these odious attacks, if, at the end of that time they are no longer necessary, be sufficient in the existing circumstances?

The English division in the colonies is entirely recruited by mariners taken from on board your vessels. It is by their means that they block up the republican ports; it is to their succor we ought to attribute the loss of these immense possessions, if the American Government should not take the step which the duty of neutrality dictates to it.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my respect.

PHILADELPHIA, 1st Floréal, (April 31, 1796, O. S.)

4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: I had the honor of writing to you on the 9th of last month, relative to the impress exercised on board your vessels by the English.
The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

Philadelphia, 22 Nineteen, (10th Jan., 1796, O. S.)

4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: Letters from the French consuls at Baltimore, Norfolk, and Alexandria, announce to me that the English have purchased a great quantity of flour in Maryland and Virginia, and that they have laden it on board American vessels, which they have likewise purchased. This flour is destined to support the English army directed against the French colonies. It is not without the most severe chargen that I have observed the enemies of my country drawing from yours means of subsistence, without which they must have renounced every species of attempt, and that I have found myself incapable of preventing them. Indeed, who could arrest the exportation of this flour, if not the Government of the United States? And, if I had solicited it of them, could I have calculated upon their considering it a favor, when they would have required that censure and rather as a favor than as a duty rising out of their neutrality? But, sir, there is another circumstance, upon which the letters from the consuls leave me no doubt, and to which the laws which the American Government have prescribed to itself for its neutrality, oblige it to pay attention. These vessels, which have purchased, are commanded, and the crew is American men. If your fellow-citizens are prohibited from serving in the cause of France, neither should they be permitted to range themselves under the British flag; otherwise the neutrality would only be a vain term, and a certain mean of assailing secretly, and without running any risk, a power which no one would dare to aid openly.

There is also another object, sir, upon which I should fix your attention. The consul at Norfolk informs me, that the English have caused to be purchased a great number of horses, in Virginia, and that even stables are established, near Norfolk, for receiving them. These horses are destined for the English cavalry, to be debarked at St. Domingo, to attempt the conquest, and to endeavor to bring about the ruin of that place. If France be interested in frustrating these projects, should not the United States also, perhaps, under certain relations, prevent the execution of them? Besides, their neutrality imposes on them the obligation of arresting the exportation of horses, which constitute the principal force of the English army. The horses are contraband of war; you are sensible of this, sir, and no contraband of war can be furnished to a Power at war, without the other Power having the right of opposing it in any manner whatever. [So says Vattel, vol. 2, book 3, chapter 7, § 115, Amsterdam edition, 1775.]

"The nation which makes war, has the greatest interest in depriving its enemy of every foreign assistance, and, therefore, has a right to regard, if not absolutely as enemies, at least as people who care very little about injuring them, those who carry to their enemy the thing which they require for war; they punish them by confiscating, their merchandise. If the sovereign of the latter should undertake to protect them, it would seem as though he himself wished to furnish this kind of succor; a step contrary to neutrality."

It is therefore evident, sir, from this passage, that no neutral Government can protect contraband of war. But would not the commercial management protect it? It shall not permit to be exported from its territory, horses destined for the English army? Indeed, sir, if, after being informed of the designs of the English, it could stop the exportation of the horses, which have purchased, and did not do it, it is evident that the omission would constitute a proof of its consent and approbation. And what difference is there in this case between tolerating contraband and protecting it?

It is useless, sir, to spin out this letter any further. I think that the facts are so self evident that I now flatter myself with receiving a proof of that friendship of which the United States have so often given assurances to the republic.

Accept, sir, the assurances of my esteem.

No. 128.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to Mr. Addt, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

Department of State, January 29, 1796.

Sir: On the 15th I received your letter of the 12th instant, and laid the same before the President of the United States.

The principle of an impartial neutrality, and the established practice, agreeably to the laws of nations, furnish answers to the subjects you have been pleased to bring into view.

You admit that, with respect to the flour which the "English have purchased in Maryland and Virginia," it would be an act of "courtesy" in the American Government to forbid its exportation. But such courtesy, you must be sensible, would violate our duty as a neutral Power, and, of course, it cannot be rendered, the purchase and exportation of flour to the dominions of the French republic having been, during the whole of the present war, perfectly free.

You also represent that the English are purchasing horses in Virginia, "and horses are contraband of war." That horses are contraband will not be questioned; but your position, "that what is thus contraband cannot be furnished to one of the Powers at war, without giving the other the right of opposing it in any manner whatever," cannot be admitted. If the subjects of a neutral Power export contraband goods, the passage you have cited from Vattel shows what kind of opposition may be given to it: the neutral exporters may be "punished by the confiscation of their merchandise," if taken at sea, by the belligerent Power against whom it is destined to be used. But the same chapter in that book informs us, that all the Powers at war have a right to resort to a neutral country "to purchase provisions, horses, and in short every thing of which they stand in need." Horses have always been a considerable article in the commerce of this country; and in the same book we find the following passage: "If a nation trades in arms, timber, ships, military stores, &c. I cannot take it amiss that it sells such things to my enemy, provided that it does not refuse to sell them to me also." The justness of this doctrine is indisputable, and has, moreover, been explicitly assented to by one of your predecessors.

Mr. Hammond, the late British minister in the United States, had represented "that arms and military accouterments were buying up by a French agent in this country, with an intent to export them to France." To this it was answered, on the part of the United States, "that our citizens have always been free to make, vend, and export arms; that it is the constant occupation and livelihood of some of them. To suppress their callings, the only means, perhaps, of their subsistence, because a war exists in foreign and distant countries, in which we have no concern, would scarcely be expected. It would be hard in principle, and impossible in practice. The law of nations, therefore, respecting the rights of those at peace, has not required from them such an internal derangement in their occupations. It is satisfied with the external penalty pronounced in the President’s proclamation, that of confiscation of such portion of these arms as shall fall into the hands of the belligerent Powers on their way to the ports of their enemies, where they are to be used. The same clause of that letter, as we have seen, was delivered by Mr. Ternant to Mr. Genet, whose answer to Mr. Jefferson, on the 27th of the same month, contains this expression: “I have no knowledge of the purchase of the arms in question, and, at all events, the reply you have made to Mr. Hammond would convince him of the nullity of his observations.”
But it may be thought that some part of this answer has occasioned the delay in answering your letter. You inform that the flour, purchased by the English in Maryland and Virginia, is laden on board American vessels which they have purchased, and that these vessels are manned by American masters and sailors; and observe, “that if our citizens are forbidden to serve the cause of France, they ought not to range them-selfs, or to allow their vessels, in the service of this Republic. This observation of Mr. Ternant has not been unheeded; and, I am assured, the minister will allow me to proceed further in stating our rights and duties in relation to the belligerent Powers; from which I trust it will appear that the interference of the American Government in any of the cases mentioned in your letter was more than unwarrantable.

So far as selling and carrying supplies of provisions and goods of all kinds to France and her dominions can be viewed as serving its cause, our citizens have been, and continue free to sell and transport them. They have never been forbidden to do this. They have merely been admonished, by the proclamation of the President, that if any of these goods should be of the kind deemed contraband, and, as such, should be seized and confiscated, we would not receive the protection of the United States. But this rule is not confined to France. It is to be observed towards all the belligerent Powers; because towards all the American Government determined to observe an exact neutrality.

In the same proclamation, the citizens of the United States were cautioned against committing, aiding, or betting hostilities against any of the Powers at war; and informed that if any of them, by doing those things, rendered themselves liable to punishment under the laws of nations, the United States would not protect them. Since that time, the Legislature of the United States has enacted a law which forbids any citizen or subjects of the United States, respecting, and exercising, within their jurisdictions, “a commission to serve a foreign prince or state in war, by land or sea,” or to “enlist, or enter himself in the service of any foreign prince or state as a soldier, or as a marine or seaman on board of any vessel of war, letter of marque, or privateer,” under the penalty of fine and imprisonment.

The same law of the United States, relative to the belligerent

Powers. And herein it was, doubtless, the intention of the Legislature to conform to the rules of the law of nations; imposing adequate penalties for the violations of those rules, but prescribing no new restraints.

Hence I conclude that it is not unlawful for the citizens of the United States to sell or hire their unarmed vessels to any of the Powers at war, and that these vessels may so far as they carry or convey contraband of war.

From the laws of nations, and of the United States, permit me to pass to the subsisting treaty of amity and commerce between France and the United States: it will, if I mistake not, throw much light on the questions you have raised, and if there remain any doubts, the treaty will guide them.

By the 23d article of the treaty the two Powers agreed that it should be lawful for the people of both countries “to sail with their ships, with all manner of liberty and security, no distinction being made who are the proprietors of the merchandises laden thereon, from any port to the places of those who were then, or thereafter shall be, at enmity with either.” It was also stipulated that free goods should be carried to foreign countries, and that every thing should be deemed free which should be found on board the ships belonging to either of the contracting parties, although the whole of the ships, or any part thereof, should appertain to the enemies of either, contraband goods being always excepted. It is also agreed that the same liberty should be extended to persons who should be found on board the ships when, although they could be enemies to either party, they are not be taken out of the ship, unless they are soldiers, and in the actual service of the enemy.

The 12th and 13th articles of the treaty particularly contemplate the case that the vessels of each of the contacting parties will take on board contraband goods to transport to the enemies of the other, and regulate the proceedings thereon. The contraband goods, if discovered, may be taken and confiscated, “but the ship itself, as well as any other goods found therein, are to be esteemed free.” And we have seen above, that the 23d article makes provision for the case where the vessels of either party should be employed in transporting the enemies of the other, and remain under arms, unless they are soldiers in the actual service of the enemy. But it is plain that the vessels themselves are to remain free.

With respect to any service rendered to the people of the two contracting parties, if we recur to the 21st article of the treaty, we find there it is imposed on the detractor but there “that they shall apply for, or take, any commission or letters of marque for arming any ship or ships to act as privateers to the order of the other.”

Practice has corresponded with these rules. Independent of the very numerous exports in single vessels, from this country, of every article it could furnish, useful to France and its dominions, two fleets, of which American vessels formed a part, sailed from the United States for France, under convoy of French men-of-war; the English vessels thus ranging themselves (if you please) under the flag of France. And can we now, as an impartial neutral nation, deny the same to the British? But will it be said that our sailors manned only our own vessels? Without supposing that none of them served on board unarm’d French vessels, permit me to ask, what is the difference between the citizens of a neutral nation hiring their unarmed vessels, with their crews, to transport provisions and stores for one of the Powers at war, and selling, and then manning the same vessels, for the same service? I do not discover any; and until a distinction can be manifested, I shall conclude that, whatever consequences may result from the measures which are the subject of your letter, these measures the Government of the United States have no right to restrain.

With great respect, I am, sir, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

No. 129.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 21st Feastos, the 13th March, 1796. (O. S.)

4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:

I have this day received the answer you were pleased to make to the letter of the 22d Nivose last. I have till now deferred prescribing additional claims.

It is not the custom of those I have the honor to address you to, because, from the arrest of the signs, by order of the Governor of Virginia, I conceived that a new examination of the question had been called for a course entirely opposite to your first resolutions; but since it is otherwise, that the American vessels have taken free passage to the French port of St. Malo, in the belligerent of the English, and the English have laden with horses, we are entitled to the purchase of horses which they have made in those States; since the yare also disposed to export these horses in vessels purchased in our ports, and navigated by American captains and sailors, you will permit me, sir, to renew my allegations with the Government of the United States, to induce it to take those measures which, in these circumstances, its duty and neutrality dictate. You must recollect, that, in my letter of the 22d Nivose, I called your attention to two questions. 1. Should the Government of the United States, in conformity with its neutrality, prevent the exportation

of an article contraband of war, purchased by the enemies of France? 2 Can that Government, without compromising its neutrality, permit its citizens to carry out of the territory of which it is the owner any vessels of that character, and, in going to another country, to carry with them, by way of evidence of title, to you some of the reasons which led me to believe that these questions, according to the law of neutrality, should be determined in favor of the republic. I flattered myself that your knowledge, and the attachment of the Government of the United States to our cause, would supply any deficiency occasioned by the summary and any argument that it appears to me that I did not explain myself in a manner sufficiently precise in order to realize my expectation.

Therefore, I shall enter into a new discussion of the questions which I presented to you in answering the different passages of your letter.

When you say that the United States should oppose the exportation of horses purchased by the English, I cited the paragraph 113, chap. 7, of Vattel, I was aware of the paragraph 110, which precedes it, and which permits that I oppose to you my paragraph 113, which relates to the exportation of war contraband. Therefore, destroy the reasoning which is subjoined to it. If it were otherwise, if Vattel should be found to contradict himself, in as clear a manner as might be supposed from your observations, we should not, in future, bring this author to our support. But, besides, the matter in question at present does not relate to citizens or subjects of a belligerent State, but to English horses purchased by the English for the purpose of carrying on the war; but to explain this fundamental article of the law of contraband to citizens, several agents of the Government in neutrality, who, coming here, as to one of their provinces, purchase horses and collect them in stables prepared by themselves, put them on board of vessels purchased in this country, and export them with as much security as if they were drawing them from their territory. If you and me should be accused by the citizens of the republic of carrying on the war, "Your Government is to punish them if it can, by confiscating their vessels," I should ask, sir, against whom should my Government act if it cannot seize this contraband which is carried on under the eye of the Government of the United States? For it would be a cruel error, says Galliani, to think that a belligerent Power has no right to refuse to a neutral Power an armed vessel which is carrying on the war, and that this vessel is to be seized by the neutral Power and sold to the envoys of the belligerent Power, and placed on the board of the republic?

In support of the conduct of the Government of the United States, you cite this paragraph from Vattel: "If a nation carries on commerce in arms, timber, ships, and ammunition, I cannot be offended at her selling these things to the enemy, provided she does not refuse to sell them to me also. But, sir, can it be inferred that a neutral Power, which has carried on commerce with the enemy, in the realm of neutral nations, should be opined to be a contraband of war? Can it be supposed that such a step would be contrary to the laws of neutrality? No, sir; for if a nation confines itself within the limits of neutrality, by granting the same advantages to the belligerent parties, it may be considered as exercising therefore the rights of a neutral Power. If I have the honor of citing to you, I will support this opinion.† "When a belligerent nation wishes a neutral and friendly people not to carry contraband of war to its enemy, she should formally, and in a very explicit manner, notify the neutral Government of its intentions; should she not do it, the neutral nation has a right to regard her silence as an assent to the continuation of her ordinary and commercial regulations."

† When a belligerent State makes such a declaration, it of course follows that it renounces the right to ask of a neutral people contraband merchandise, the exportation of which it desires to be prohibited to the enemy; and, consequently, it submits its country to an impartial observance of the refusal of prohibition. This would be unjust to exact a deviation from principles in its favor, and by committing this fault, the neutral Government would soon or late hazard a departure from its position.

But, sir, when I requested that the English might not be allowed to export horses from this country, I tacitly obliged myself, in the name of the republic, not to cause any exportation of a similar nature. I do not conceive that you could ever reproach me of having wished to lead you from the limits of neutrality in our favor; having requested that neutrality might be equally observed towards our enemies and us. Hence, sir, you should be far from suspecting that I wished to profit of an advantage which I desired to see refused to the enemies of my country; and the government of the United States should, I conceive, admit my claim, on demanding an explicit declaration from me of the restriction which you justly imagined I had tacitly imposed on myself. For "the declaration being made (says Galliani) to the neutral State, desiring that it should grant no contraband of war, the latter is to submit its country to an impartial observance of the refusal of prohibition. This would cause an extreme and insuperable injury to her, because every thing serving immediately to the destruction of humanity, should be refused rather than granted, in all cases where a just and wise Government has the choice. "Such a demand commoves more with a real impartiality, with sincere friendship, and with the desire of carrying on a commerce, than with the safety of its country."

I had every reason to hope that, penetrated with these principles, the Government of the United States did not expect, in requesting that the English might not be permitted to export horses, I should declare, in the name of the republic, that she imposed on herself the condition not to export them; but, since it is required, I make that declaration, sir, and now, like the French, I am coming to the principles I have developed to you, it will be followed with the effect I expect from it. I do not conceive, sir, that you should avail yourself of the exceptions contained in the passage of Galliani, which I have cited, to answer my demand in the negative; for horses do not constitute the principal branch of the commerce of the United States. Your exports in 1798 states the number of horses to have been 75,551, which, at a mean price of $40, amount to about 391,220 livres tournois; but what is this sum in comparison to 115,500,000 tournois, the whole amount of your exports? Besides, by preserving your horses in the country, and keeping them at a moderate price, by not exporting them, would you not promote agriculture and the interest of your country; would you not accord with the rules of policy?

But, supposing that the exportation of the horses constitutes a principal branch of your commerce, could this fact be made use of to authorize the exportation of that species of contraband of war? Could it be said that the Government of the United States is an ally of the neutrals, of which the conduct which Denmark, Sweden, the city of Hamburg, and particularly the Swiss, have held, in the present case, entirely opposed to that assertion. It would be too tedious to offer you all the examples I could cite; I shall content myself with speaking of the Swiss, of whose commerce the exportation of horses forms a principal branch.

Nor, you know, sir, that neither the wisdom of the Swiss, their knowledge, their ancient experiences, their exact observance of treaties, nor their respect for the law of nations, can be doubted; you know that their country is situated between France and the territory of her enemies, and that it consequently offers great resources to the belligerents of the various articles of contraband of war, each Power has every advantage to procure, from the advantages of this situation; but as soon as one of the Powers is forced to draw war on the Swiss, the Helvetic Republic is forced to restrain her contraband of war, and the others presented complaints on the subject, the Swiss immediately stopped the exportation. They have, moreover, prohibited the exportation of all contraband of war, even that of horses, which constitute their principal branch of commerce, and the consequences of this consistent principle, have enabled them to disengage their country and friends to peace, to restrain their commerce, by refusing to their neighbors all contraband of war, than to extend their commercial relations, by furnishing each with the means of continuing the war.

I have no idea that the conduct of one Government does not always serve as a rule to another: I know that I have no means to enforce your Government to follow the example of the Swiss; I cite to it but I shall not make known to it that the principles which I have laid down are not foreign to a free and enlightened policy.

See the quotation at the conclusion of this letter.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

[1797]

Besides, sir, were all people to prefer their commercial interests to the principles of neutrality, which I have developed, should that be a reason for the United States to imitate them, when France and her enemies are in question? What would you think of their Governor General pretending to give his subjects permission to keep the French neutral flag? When the English seized your neutral vessels, it caused them to be seized in like manner; but as I mentioned to you in my letter of the 1st of September, 1795, which remains unanswered, it was not from the same motive. No, sir, it was not from any desire to support the French, or to give them encouragement, however, did she long follow the same course? Did she not revoke the orders which had been given? Are not the decrees of the 25th Brumaire and 15th Frimaire, in the 3d year, which I sent you with my letter of the 26th Messidor, evident proofs of it? When, in the course of last summer, Great Britain again caused your vessels to be arrested, to prevent their carrying grain to France, did they not at once do it in the same manner? Has she not already revoked her orders for the same purpose, even to the injury of her own interests? But if the amicable relations of two people are reciprocal, why, at this time, should you refuse to acknowledge the fidelity of France, by an act equally faithful? especially when that act would not compromise your interests, and would be conformable to the laws of neutrality, and, in certain respects, to the object of treaties. It is a very different conduct of governments as with that of individuals—it is not by words but by actions that friendship and attachment are proved.

You will, perhaps, object to this, sir, that you would promote the anger of Great Britain against the American Government, and thereby lose the protection in the event of the war but this is, I am afraid, rather to promote the anger of France? and would you not better fulfill the object that all neutral nations should propose to themselves, that of maintaining a good understanding with the belligerent parties, by at once refusing to France and England the right of withdrawing from you an article contraband of war, which the latter Power cannot expect without the receipt of a real bounty? Besides, why should England complain? A general measure operating upon all, injures no one in particular.

If I have proved to you, sir, as I cannot doubt, from all I have said, that it comports with the laws of neutrality, with your relations as to the belligerent Powers, to stop the exportation of the horses which the English draw from you, the request I have made in this respect was founded; and I conclude upon the first question that the Government of the United States should, agreeable to the laws of neutrality, arrest the exportation of an article contraband of war purchased by the enemies of France.

Has the President not made one of the questions which form the subject of this letter, I pass to the second.

It is conceived in these terms. Can the Government of the United States, without compromising its neutrality, permit its citizens to serve on board vessels belonging to the enemies of France?

This question relates to the manoeuvres practiced by the English in Virginia, and which they are still carrying on in the bays of this continent. The American citizens, with whom they are now at war, are the English seamen and sailors.

It is to this conduct of the English that this phrase of my letter of 22 Nivolet refers. "If your citizens are not to serve the cause of France, they should not range themselves under the flag of Great Britain." I conceived it had a meaning sufficiently precise; it is now the first, and in the present case, the only right in the power of your citizens, with regard to France and England; that is to say, that they should not serve in the military operations of the two nations. But I have still had the misfortune of being deceived on this head, and I shall enter into new explanations on the subject.

You must not suppose that, of all the states in the union, and to those of the United States, your citizens cannot enrol themselves in the service of any foreign Prince or State; that is to say, that your citizens cannot aid in any manner the military operations of any foreign Prince or Power; but can the military operations of a foreign Prince or Power be aided only in the above mentioned characters? You think so, sir; I venture to hope that you will not permit your own citizens to serve in your armies to the injury of your country. It is the same rule to prove that from one place to another, without serving in the war? Do not the transports filled with troops and ammunition, sailing with and debarking under the protection of a fleet, form a part of that fleet? Are they not necessary means to the success of the projected operation? And are the captains and sailors of the ships? And because they are not on board of ships of war, it may be said they are not in the service of the belligerent Powers; that they do not aid its operations. No, sir, such an assertion can never be fairly advanced; it would be to torture words, and to fall into, particular distinctions, which should never be met with in free and faithful discussions.

I think, sir, that these principles being admitted, you will readily conceive that, if the laws of the United States and our treaties are silent on the circumstance just cited; that, if it has not been foreseen and explicitly declared contrary to neutrality, it is not the less so in itself, and should be prevented by every nation who wishes to preserve her neutrality.

But, sir, are not the American vessels purchased by the English become, by the very act of sale, English property? Although you found no difference

More than that of a neutral nation hiring their unarmed vessels, with their crews, to transport provisions and stores for one of the Powers at war, and selling, and then manning the same vessels for the same service,"

Still, however, there will exist between the two cases the following distinction: In the first, your fellow-citizens man American vessels; in doing this, they use the right appurtenant to them, and are the owners of the vessels, on the one hand, to be navigated by them under the American flag, and by American captains and sailors, and which have no right to your protection, since they are enemy's property. For you know, sir, that, in order to acknowledge an armament as belonging to a nation, the vessel and two-thirds of the crew must belong to that nation. If your citizens have been admitted, are not those vessels destined to transport the horses, ammunition, and troops, designed for the conquest and devastation of our colonies? That therefore the American captains and sailors on board of them will serve in the expedition? And after what I have said, can you allow this without injuring your neutrality? Can you, without injuring us, furnish to our enemies an arm to aid them in their conquests? You are not uninformed that the English military marine is furnished by that of commerce, but if a foreign nation furnishes that marine with auxiliaries for its service, it is clear that she so much augments the force of the military marine; and also when transports and other unarmed vessels are placed among those of commerce, and serving in a military operation, it is certain that the nation furnishing these vessels with seamen, will have the same right in the use of them, as the English have had in this case. What is the true character of these seamen in the British service? Do they not aid in the operations of war? Do they not serve the maritime purposes of the belligerent nation? Do they not injure your neutrality? and is not this the case now that your citizens are serving on board of English vessels?

What I have said is, I conceive, sufficient to prove that the United States should not permit their citizens to man any English vessels whatever; but it is necessary that I should answer some of the observations you have advanced in support of a contrary opinion.

I need not make any remark on the distinction you admit between an armed and an unarmed vessel. It is, I conceive, destroyed by the reasoning presented to you; but I should call your attention to the identity you wish to establish between these two species of vessels. It is a case which presents this point to us with great clearness; my countrymen have been taken, the Americans, having ranged themselves under the French flag, could not be prevented from putting themselves under that of Great Britain. But, sir, how do you find an analogy in two cases which are dissimilar? Be pleased to recollect that the vessels which sailed from your ports and under your flag, to carry cargoes of ships of war were not America's; and that, however, the American seamen did not wear French uniform, they might not be considered as French vessels; and that, if any English captains and seamen from serving on board of English vessels, you then suppose, sir, that your seamen have served on board of ours. But you are not ignorant that the pay of American sailors is higher than that of our marines; when a man labors for a livelihood, he will not quit a station in which he finds much profit for one less lucrative. Seamen, therefore, have not been in the habit of quitting one port for another, unless they have been used to obtain them; never have seamen been impressed in France; never have our officers at sea exercised this atrocious act with regard to neutral nations. By your supposition, therefore, one might be supported in tolerating an infraction of the neutrality of the United States.

I conceive, sir, that having proved to you that American vessels purchased by the English, being English property, you have, as a subordinate, served on board of them, I may conclude that the United States cannot, without compromising their neutrality, permit their citizens to serve the enemies of France.

I shall not make any reflection upon the last sentence of your answer. "I shall conclude that whatever consequences may be the measure of your letters, these measures the Government of the United States have no right to restrain."

It is the province of my Government, to which I shall send your letter, to explain and to draw the consequences resulting from it.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my esteem.

P. A. ADIT.

No. 130.

The Secretary of State to the Minister Plenipotentiary of France.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 25, 1796.

SIR:

I intended long since to have returned an answer to your letter of the 11th of March, in which you renew your objections to the purchase and exportation of horses by the British from the United States. It was some time before it was in my power to consider your remarks, and examine the authority of Galliani, which you quoted; but that perusal and examination convinced me that the line of conduct which the Government of the United States had prescribed to itself was that which it ought still to pursue. I considered the right of the citizens of the United States to sell and export contraband goods to any of the belligerent Powers as uncontrovertedly established by the principles of the war. In the tract on this subject which I now contain a demonstration of this right, you have passed over in silence, and recourse to the authorities of Vattel and Galliani, especially of the latter, on the rights and duties of neutral powers. These authorities, however, appear to me as little to support your claims on the subject of the American Government; and I forbear to quote (as the same author says elsewhere) "we ought to consider the whole discourse together, in order perfectly to conceive the sense of it." (L. 5, ch. 17, § 355.) In both the sections cited, (110 and 113) the rights of neutrals to trade in articles contraband of war is clearly established: In the first, by selling to the warring Powers, who come to the neutrality of the United States, to buy them, by the neutral subjects or citizens carrying to the countries of the Powers at war, and there selling them.

The same just rule of interpretation applied to the discourse of Galliani on this subject, will exhibit a result not less just, and fit, if I say, to the true principles of the American Government.

Your first quotation from that author is a marginal note, importing that, if a belligerent Power cannot seize contraband articles sold to an enemy, it may, nevertheless, object against it, compel it as an injury, and demand and do itself that justice which an injured sovereign has a right to exact.

To this I will submit a passage from the 4th section of the same chapter and book which you have cited: "I repeat it, then, once for all, that neutral nations must observe the most conscientious sincerity, as well in refraining from the sale of contraband of war as from all exportation of it, except only in the cases I have above spoken of."

A recurrence to these exceptions, and to the other observations of this writer, will show that his doctrine does not reasoning on this subject. I shall content myself with quoting a few of his remarks.

Book 1, ch. 5, § 3. "Much greater is the number of those who believed that every belligerent Power possessed essentially the right of forbidding neutral Powers to sell arms and warlike stores to its enemy; and that this is a full right, that is, a right of strict justice. They do not distinguish the circumstances, when the neutral Powers carry on trade with one of the belligerents, and supply it with arms and warlike stores, and when, with perfect impartiality, they trade with both. In the first case, the preference of one party is apparent, and in the second, neutrality is respected in all respects. And so it is with an end; but as, in the other case, friendship does not appear to have ceased, there is not yet to be discovered any reason to act inimically on this account towards a friend."

And, in truth, this reflected will certainly conduce to conclude that neutral Powers cannot be forbidden to exercise a free trade, even in contraband, as long as they exercise it in an impartial manner with both belligerent parties, or are willing to do so. Therefore say that they decide very unjustly.

I say, then, that those nations who have not otherwise bound themselves by express compact, it is not a duty of strict right to carry no contraband articles to the belligerent Powers: for, if a neutral Power had a full and complete right to set itself against such trade, yet, between two sovereigns, who are placed in the situation of natural equality, freedom, and independence, the full right of the one is annihilated by the full right of the other. And, in opinion of neutral nations, the renunciation of their own convenience in favor of the greater convenience of another is only a duty of equity, but of essential and strict right."

"Hence it follows that we must often inquire and distinguish whether the trade in those goods which are called contraband is of greater or less importance to the nation which exercises it. In the first case, since we are discussing a duty of favor, which admits of infinite gradations, we cannot confidently expect an extraordinary and very affecting sacrifice, as we may when it extends only to a small inconvenience.""

Then follow what the author states as the true positions of this matter, some of which you have cited:

1. When a belligerent nation desires a friendly neutral nation to carry no contraband to its enemy, it must formally notify it to buy them: in the natural course of things, the belligerent Power cannot comply with the requisition.

2. When it has thus disclosed its request, it must itself renounce all pretensions to be furnished with contraband goods.

3. When a neutral State has entered into a treaty of peace and commerce with one of the belligerent Powers, stipulating to carry no contraband to the enemy, there is always a condition implied that the like goods shall be denied to both the belligerent Powers, without distinction.

4. Consequently the belligerent State, which has never disclosed to its neutral friend that it did not see with content the supplying its enemy with contraband of war, and much more if it has availed itself of this privilege, has bought arms and other sorts of military stores, or, what is of more account, has received from it soldiers, recruits, horses, has no further right to expect that the neutral should not show the like to the enemy.

5. If the neutral State were engaged in the war, carry any contraband to the belligerent Powers, must always be followed, when it does not induce a very great and intolerable inconvenience, inasmuch as what tends immediately to the destruction of mankind is with better reason refused than permitted; and, therefore, this desire, much more than its opposite, comports with true impartiality, since it is not the right of a neutral State to thrust its goods upon an invader."

I will cite only one more passage from Galliani, which appears to be the result of his considerations on this sub-

B. 1, ch. 9, § 4. "If we reflect more upon it, it must be acknowledged that the first position of the principle, which I have above established, recurs—that belligerent Powers have no right to make this demand, (not to carry contraband to the enemy) as also that there lies no duty of strict right upon the neutral to refrain from the trade of contraband of war. In the mean time, the desire of the belligerent, who possesses no full right to ask, must be declared in decent and temperate terms; and the request cannot be considered as discreet and acceptable when it occasions too great inconvenience to the party to whom it is addressed."

I will close this letter with a few observations.

It is well known that a considerable portion of the exports of the United States consists of articles contraband of war. It is well known that these have, during the whole of the present war, been freely exported to the dominions of France, as well as those of all other belligerents, and that Galliani's (4th position) for France to desire that the citizens of the United States should now abandon a commerce of which she has availed herself during the several years of the war to this time; and still less ought she, while continuing to enjoy an otherwise unrestrained trade in contraband goods, to expect such an abandonment of only a particular article of commerce of which she may have no need, and which may chance to be very useful to her enemy. Under these circumstances, a compliance on the part of the United States would compromit their interests as well as their neutrality. The wants of two or more belligerent Powers may together embrace the general objects of the commerce of a neutral nation; but, if each were possessed of a right to receive, and the other of a right to exclude, the entire commerce which was peculiarly useful to its enemy, the entire commerce of such neutral nation might be annihilated.

The article of horses, although not constituting a principal part of the entire commerce of the United States, yet it is one of those articles that, as a matter of business, thwarts the neutrality of no other nation. It has been the practice of this country, during the present war, to furnish horses to the United States in the trade of some of the colonies (now States) to all parts of the West Indias; and, during the whole of the present war, horses and mules (and oxen, which may be used for military purposes as well as either) have been freely exported to the French as well as to the English islands. It may be seen that this commerce, while it has been prevented the present war, objecions to it have been shown to all the belligerent Powers. Without doubting the fact, (of which I had no previous knowledge) I must suppose that very particular motives influenced the Swiss to this determination, which, however full of wisdom at this time, is repugnant to the common practice of those people for ages. "Amidst all the wars of Europe (says Vauban) the nation which shall be first in the matter of neutrality is naturally allowed to come thither, and purchase provisions, if the country has a surplus, horses, military stores, &c."

I will now notice the other question, which you again bring into view, whether the United States can, without compromitting their neutrality, allow their citizens to serve in the vessels of the enemies of France.

Having in my former letter entered into a full consideration of this subject, and the force of the distinctions and reasons then taken and urged appearing to me still unshaken, I will content myself with a few remarks. I must still rely on the distinction taken in the law of the United States, between our citizens serving on board of armed vessels of war, and those serving on board merchant vessels. Having in my former letter viewed this matter with respect to the neutral duties, it would certainly have been forbidden, as well as the former. To admit that our citizens cannot lawfully enrol themselves in the direct military land or sea service of one of the Powers at war, is very different from your position, that they cannot, in any manner, in the commerce of their country, plunder or exclude them from carrying, even in foreign vessels, not only soldiers, horses, arms, &c. but even provisions: for to the success of military operations the latter are as essential as the former. Probably there is not one of the maritime belligerent Powers that has not, in the course of this war, derived aid, in its military operations, from provisions and other supplies lawfully furnished by the citizens of the United States. Further, in my former letter, I proved, from our commercial treaty with France, that it was lawful for the citizens of the United States to transport not only contraband goods, but her enemies, and even soldiers in actual service. For when the two nations, in the 13th and 23d articles, regulated the course of proceedings in such cases, they clearly admitted the legality of the measure, reserving only to each the right of answering for the property of their respective citizens, and making prisoners of such soldiers. Had the contrary been their intention, instead of regulating, they would have prohibited the trade or carriage of contraband goods, and the transportation of troops.

Admitting these conclusions to be just, (and such they appear to me) how shall we draw a line between the strong case you have stated, and the transportation of troops and stores in ordinary cases? The case you state is that of a fleet and army destined for some military expedition, and you ask whether the transports of neutrals, following in the train of such an armament, would not make a part of it? I confess to you, that the question presents some difficulties: but as the case does not exist, it is not necessary for me to answer it. I am not informed what is the custom of the maritime Powers in this respect. The question between us regards only the detached transportation of articles contraband of war, either in our own vessels or the unarmed vessels of one of the belligerent Powers. On this point, for the reasons now and formerly given, no doubt exists. To restrain the naval and commercial pursuits of neutrals would be but indirectly to impair the navigation and trade. It is the very principle on which Great Britain has, in many of her wars, grounded her practice of capturing neutral vessels, carrying on the simple commerce of her enemies, particularly of France. If, said she, neutral vessels are permitted to transport the commodities of France and her colonies, then her sailors, taken from the service of her merchants, will enable her to man more numerous ships of war. But although Britain thus captured the vessels of neutrals, she never considered the persons employed in such commerce, or the nations to which they belonged, as her enemies.

The difficulty is, in my opinion, in which you recite the concluding sentence of my former letter, you seem to consider it as very exceptional. You will therefore permit me to explain it. In your letter, to which that was an answer, you had stated the object, and brought into view the possible consequences of allowing the British to export horses from the United States. It was not mere the other's matter of the question, and although you had not propounded any plan either by treaty or the law of nations, and that an impartial neutrality forbid the Government to impose the restraint you demanded, to remark that, if the predicted consequences should follow the measures you opposed, the Government had no right to restrain them. If you imagined that even an indifference, much more an unfeigned disposition to follow the interests of France, gave rise to the remark, the sentiments of the Government have been wholly misconceived.

I have the honor to be, &c.

No. 321.

The Ministers Plenipotentiares of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, the 29th Floréal, (May 18, 1796, O. S.), 4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Six:

I have just been informed, indirectly, that the House of Representatives has passed a bill for preventing the sale of the prizes which shall be brought in by the ships of war of the belligerent Powers. If this law did not appear to me to destroy the effects of our commercial treaty; if it did not appear to me opposite to the duties of an important national character, if it did not appear to me contrary to the interest of the United States, I should not wait for a remonstrance from my Government, oblige me, at present, to transmit some observations which seem to me calculated to merit your attention.

SIX: The 17th and 22d articles of their commercial treaty, the United States and France agree, in an explicit manner, that in case one of the two Powers should be at war, its enemies should be excluded from the ports of the other, when they shall have made prizes on its citizens. When they mutually guaranteed a free admission of their ships of war, of their privates, and of their respective prizes into these ports, it is clear that they implicitly assured to each other the right of selling these prizes. In fact, France having no continental possessions in America towards the latitude to which English vessels must go on their return to England, it was to her of extreme importance to have friendly ports into which her vessels might conduct their prizes and sell them, without being exposed to the risks of the sea; which would be the case if they were obliged to send them to France or to her colonies. It was also interesting to the Americans engaged in a war with an European Power, to have ports into which they might conduct and freely sell their prizes made upon the coast of Europe, without being forced to cross the Atlantic.

Such considerations leave no doubt that, by the 17th and 22d articles of the treaty concluded between the United States and France, each nation had implicitly secured to herself the right of selling in the ports of the other the prizes which her ships of war or privates should have made. This right, which the two nations should enjoy, has been avowed and justified by me the President of the Government of the United States.

Whenever our enemies have attacked a prize made by a privateer, it has been only under the pretext that the privateer had been armed in the United States, and that she had therefore derogated from both the laws of neutrality and the President's proclamation.

The courts have never condemned French prizes but upon the fact of having armed in the United States; and when the contrary has been fully proved, the privateer had the right of selling the prizes without any obstacle. Yet in virtue of what act could she sell her prize? Of the 22d article of our commercial treaty. This article imports a standing right, but it is the implication that a number of such vessels should be armed in the ports of the one nation, and brought in and sold by the other nation. The American Government conceived that this construction could not be given to the 22d article; it explained itself formally in this respect; but did not object to the right of selling prizes; it has even expressly acknowledged it, since it has constantly permitted the French ships of war and privates to enjoy it.

The enemies of France could not accuse you of violating the rules of neutrality by leaving to her the free exercise of this right, as it resulted from the casus fideis, and the obligations prescribed by a treaty do not lead a neutral nation from the line of neutrality whenever she acquits herself of them. Therefore, sir, the English cannot, for that reason, bring in her prizes here. The Secretary of State assured me, in his letter of 6th July, 1796, that this stipulation of our treaty should be faithfully observed in this respect by the American Government. Since, notwithstanding the similar right assured to the King of Great Britain by his treaty with the United States, it is stipulated that it should not derogate from former treaties entered into by the United States. It is clear, therefore, from this that, during the whole course of the present war; in virtue of our treaties, enjoy alone the right of bringing in and selling our prizes here. But if, at present a law existed, prohibiting, in general terms, the sale of prizes, it would bear upon France alone; and at the same time that it deprived her of an advantage granted by her treaty it would tend to affect the balance of neutrality.

In fact, sir, French ships of war bringing out alone the right of bringing in and selling their prizes here, it would be the interest of England, in case she could not procure the same advantage, to deprive France of it: for to take an advantage from our enemy is a real benefit to us, even though we could not employ it. Besides, would not England by this means have new chances in her favor? If our prizes were sold here, it would be the case, that they must be conducted to the colonies or to France; and would not the English then have greater opportunities for intercepting them? It is evident, therefore, that the law procured for preventing the sale of prizes is entirely in favor of the English, and to our disadvantage. But if it be the duty of a neutral nation neither to grant nor refuse more to one of the belligerent powers than to another, whether he do or not exist particular stipulations provided for treaties previous to the war, it follows that the law in question being in favor of Great Britain cannot be conformable to the rules of neutrality.

I venture to hope that you will feel as I do the justness of my observations; and that the Government of the United States will take the necessary measures for preventing the effects of a law contrary to the treaties and to the duties of a neutral nation.

Accept, sir, &c.

P. A. ADET.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 4, 1796.

Sir:

On the 26th, I received your letter of the 18th instant, and in order to have the honor to observe, that although the sale of prizes brought into the ports of the United States by armed vessels of the French republic have hitherto been prohibited, yet it has been regarded by us not as a right to which the captors were entitled either by the law of nations or our treaty of amity and commerce with France; the contrary has been explicitly declared by the Government of the United States, and formally acknowledged by the French Government in the year 1789 by the minister of the United States at Paris. In the letter of the 16th of August of that year, from Mr. Jefferson to Mr. de Ternant, it is the following passages: "The seventeenth article of our treaty (with France) leaves to armed vessels free to conduct whersoever they pleased the ships and goods taken from their enemies, without paying any duty, and to depart and be conducted freely to the places expressed in their commissions, which the captain shall be obliged to show. It is evident that this article does not contemplate a freedom to sell their prizes here; but on the contrary, a durance to some other place, always to be expressed in their commission, where their validity is to be finally adjudged." On the claim of the French agents at that time, not only to sell their prize goods, but to sell them free of duty, Mr. Jefferson remarks, that this article "does not give the right to sell at all." And afterwards, in the same letter, he mentions the exclusive admission to sell here the prizes made by France on her enemies, in the present war, though unstipulated in our treaties, and unfounded in her own practice, or in that of the other nations, as we believe. For the sake of France on this point, you will permit me to resort to her treaty of navigation and commerce made with Great Britain in 1786. In the 16th article it is stipulated that it should not be lawful for commerce of objects of either crown, and who should have commissions from any other Prince or State, an enemy to one or the other, to arm their vessels in the ports of either of the two kingdoms, to sell there the prizes they shall make, or to exchange them in any manner whatsoever. This treaty having been made subsequent to the treaty between France and the United States, it is plain, that she did not consider the 16th article as mutilating with the 17th of her prior treaty with us. The truth is, that the corresponding articles in the two treaties contain only negative stipulations in regard to the enemy of one or the other, and positively oblige the selling of prizes by such enemies, without any affirmative stipulation that the parties themselves may do either.

Instead of detaining you by any further observations, allow me to refer you to the aforementioned letter of Mr. Jefferson, which has been published, in which the construction we give to the articles of our treaty of amity and commerce with France, which you have quoted, is illustrated and maintained with a clearness and force of reasoning that removes every doubt.

It being then a position demonstrated, that France has no claim, of right, to sell prizes in the ports of the United States, it was not necessary to make any further consideration of the conveniences or inconveniences which either party might receive or suffer by the permission or prohibition of such sales. In other nations, except where treaties with other nations impose a restraint, there is a right to judge for itself. France exercised this right in her aforementioned treaty of commerce with Great Britain, and the United States propose to exercise the same right in this case.

The remaining observations in your letter, being grounded on the supposition of a right to sell French prizes in our ports, and this supposed right having been proved not to exist, I may be excused from making any remarks upon them. You quote the assurance given you by the late Secretary of State, that the 22d article of our treaty with France, forbidding any of her enemies, and, consequently, at this time, the British, to bring and dispose of their prizes, in our ports, would be faithfully observed by the American Government; and I may confidently repeat, that it will be observed. The law in question furnishes a proof of it, by the universality of its prohibitions. This form of the proposed law ought to rescue the United States from the reproach of favoring Great Britain: for a neutral nation can be responsible only for the equality of its rules of conduct towards the belligerent Powers, and not for the effects of an exact observance of those rules, which must depend on the situation and circumstances of the warring Powers themselves.

I am, with great respect, sir, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

No. 133.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 13, 1796.

Sir: The merchants of Philadelphia are extremely alarmed by the conduct of a small privateer called the Flying Fish, bearing, it is understood, a commission from the French republic. It is said she has been lying in this port for some time, preparing for sea; and it seems, that, after inquiring and observing what valuable vessels were to sail for foreign ports, she sailed herself to the capes of Delaware, and, not far from thence, lay in wait for the vessels she had marked for her prey. Accordingly, on the 9th instant, she seized on the ship Mount Vernon, belonging to Mr. Murgatroyd, a merchant of Philadelphia, within two hours after the pilot had left her, and within about six leagues of cape Henlopen, took possession of all her papers, and forced the master, mate, and all her crew, save two men, to leave her, and, under these circumstances, she was sent they know not whither! For your more particular information of the circumstances of the capture of this ship, and the designs of the captors, I enclose the protest of the master and his two mates.

Such conduct has more the appearance of an act of piracy, than of the lawful procedure of an armed vessel, regularly commissioned by your republic. Other vessels were on the point of leaving the Delaware bay, but witnessing, or hearing of this outrage, have put back, and returned up the river for safety.

I have been directed, sir, by the President of the United States to represent this case to you, and to request information, if you are possessed of any, concerning this privateer, her name, the name of her commander, whether she is commissioned by the French republic, and what instructions or orders accompany the commission to regulate her conduct.

If the papers found on board the ship, or any other evidence, afforded any just ground to believe her to be the property of an enemy to the French republic, still, neither the master nor the mate (especially the former,) ought to have been removed, but to have been suffered to continue in the ship, that, to whatever port she might be sent for adjudication, a claim on the part of the owners might have been presented at the proper tribunal, and their right maintained. This flagrant violation of a common rule, the observance of which is essential to the support of justice, induces a suspicion that the capturing vessel is a pirate, or a privateer violating the authority of a commission, and the instructions prescribed to regulate her proceedings.

I have only further to express to you, sir, the President's reliance, that if you are possessed of any information on the subject of this letter, you will communicate the same with the candor and frankness due from the representative of a friendly and allied nation.

With great respect, I am, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

P. S. The public solicitude is so great on this subject, and so many vessels are, in consequence, detained, you will permit me to request a speedy answer.

PHILADELPHIA, 26 Prairial, (June 14, 1796, O. S.), 4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: I have received the letter you did me the honor to write me, relative to the seizure of the ship Mount Vernon by the French privateer the Flying Fish.

I am vexed, sir, not to have it in my power to give you the information you request of me. I cannot say whether the privateer, which is certainly a vessel commissioned by the republic, and come from St. Domingo to this port, has or has not acted conformably to orders which have been transmitted to her; I do not know the instructions given by the Directory to its commissioners in the colonies, nor do I know what conduct he has prescribed to them to cause to be observed, by the armed vessels under their orders, in regard to neutrals trading with the enemies of the republic. It is impossible for me, at this moment, to furnish you with precise explanations; I shall, therefore, write to the colonies to obtain them, and I will immediately transmit to you what shall come to my knowledge, as well as to this point, as concerning the event which is the object of your letter. Accept, sir, &c.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 5, 1796.

Sir: Some time in June last, I troubled you with an inquiry about the privateer called the Flying Fish, which had captured the ship Mount Vernon. The answer you then gave would have superseded any application at this time, had not the owner and officers of the privateer abused your authority, or that of the French consul at Philadelphia, or both: for I am informed, that the owner reports, that from you he had his particular orders to take the Mount Vernon, and many more vessels; and a deposition, now before me, states that some of his officers declare that the consul expressly told them to take the ship Mount Vernon, and that if she was not covered British property, he would indemnify them.

Under these circumstances, the owners deem it important, in the prosecution of their claim, to be furnished with some document which shall enable them to repel the groundless assertions, above mentioned, of Paris and its officers. Hence, I trust you will pardon any troubling you again on this subject, and requesting that you will be pleased to direct the consul to make out an official certificate for that purpose.

With great respect, I am, sir, &c.

PHILADELPHIA, 16th Feuvaire, (7th October, 1796, O. S.), 5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:—I have received with astonishment the letter you did me the honor to address to me on the 5th October. I have interrogated the consul on the subject of which it treats, and I have the honor to inform you, that I have forbidden him to subscribe any declaration relative to an affair in which individuals have undertaken to introduce his and my name without any authority for so doing.

In remaining a stranger to this affair, you may rest assured I observe a conduct as favorable as possible to the interests of the American citizens, in the name of whom the Mount Vernon was fitted out.

The Secretary of State to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 1, 1796.

Sir:—It being the duty of the Executive of the United States to watch over their interests, I am instructed by the President to request of you an explanation on the subject of the following questions.

1. Whether the Government of France have decreed any new regulations or orders relative to the commerce of the United States?

2. Whether these regulations or orders, (if such exist) are confined to vessels laden wholly or in part with provisions? If not so confined, to what other articles they extend?

3. Whether American vessels, laden wholly or in part with provisions, and destined to any other ports than those of France or her dominions, particularly if destined to any English ports, are directed to be captured and carried into French ports, and their cargoes entire, or such parts thereof as consist of provisions, or other specified articles, applied to the use of the French republic or its citizens?

4. If such captures are authorized by the French republic, or by the decrees or orders of any branch of its Government, on what grounds such authority, decrees, or orders, have been given?

These questions, you will perceive, sir, have relation to reports of designs relative to the commerce of the United States, which cannot fail to excite apprehensions in the minds of our merchants. The general interests of the United States are intimately blended with that of the French republic, and the good understanding and friendship between the two nations, which it has been the uniform desire of the American Government to maintain, require me to request an early answer to this letter.

PHILADELPHIA, the 26th Messidor, (14th July, 1796, O. S.), 4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:—The business with which I have been harrassed has prevented me from answering sooner the letter you did me the honor to write to me on the 1st of July.

I am sorry, sir, to be obliged to leave you in an uncertainty, in which I myself participate. I do not know the nature of the orders which may have been given by my Government to the officers of the ships of war of the republic, or what conduct it has prescribed to them to hold with regard to the neutral vessels trading with our enemies. I am not informed whether the ancient arrêts of the committee of public safety relative to the commerce of the United States are still in force or not. Some considerable time having elapsed, since I have received news from France, I cannot have recourse to old dates to resolve your doubts. I can only refer to the answer which I had the honor of giving to your letter relative to the Mount Vernon.

The consul at Boston has just informed me that the collector of the customs there has prevented the unloading and sale of the prizes carried into that port by two French privates. The consul has informatively complained to him. The collector founds his refusal upon a letter which he says he received from you.

I request you, sir, to inform me whether the President has caused orders to be given for preventing the sale of prizes carried into the ports of the United States by vessels of the republic, or privates armed under its authority, and if so, upon what foundation this prohibition rests.

Accept, sir, &c.

No. 139.

The Secretary of State to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 10, 1796.

Sir:—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th instant, in answer to mine of the 1st. You embraced the occasion to communicate the information you had received from the consul at Boston, that the collector of the customs there has prevented the unloading and selling of the prizes carried into that port by two French privates; groundning his proceeding on a letter received from me; and you inquire, whether the President has given orders to prevent the sale of prizes carried into the ports of the United States by vessels of the republic, or privates armed under its authority, and if so, upon what foundation this prohibition rests? I will be frank, sir, in answering these questions, after making some preliminary observations.

The question about the sale of prizes is not a new one. It was agitated, and the point of right settled in the year 1793. Among the state papers communicated to Congress at the close of that year, and which have been published, is a letter from Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Morris, dated the 10th August, in which is the following passage: "The 17th article of our treaty [meaning with France] leaves armed vessels free to conduct, whithsoever they please, the ships and goods taken from their enemies, without paying any duty, and to depart and be conducted freely to the places expressed in their commissions, which the captain shall be obliged to show. It is evident that this article does not contemplate a freedom to sell their prizes here; but on the contrary, a departure to some other place, always to be expressed in their commission, where their validity is to be finally adjudged. In such case it would be as unreasonable to demand duties on the goods they had taken from an enemy, as it would be on the cargo of a merchant vessel touching in our ports for refreshment or advices. And against this the article provides. But the armed vessels of France have been also admitted to land and sell there the prizes, for which they should pay duties as the goods of a merchantman landed and sold for consumption. They have, however, demanded, as a matter of right, to sell them free of duty; a right, they say, given by this article of the treaty, though the article does not give the right to sell at all.

This article is in the same sense. And accordingly, in her treaty of commerce with Great Britain, in 1786, she entered into a stipulation which, in the case of a war between the United States and Great Britain, would have prevented the vessels of the United States from armizing as privateers, or selling their prizes in the ports of France. In like manner, the United States in their commercial treaty with Great Britain, in 1815, made a similar provision for a similar prohibition. Indeed, the 24th article of the latter treaty is but a translation of the 16th between France and Great Britain.

Under this view of the case, sir, as soon as provision was made on both sides to carry into effect the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, it became a duty of the Government of the United States to countermand the permission formerly given to French privateers to sell their prizes in our ports. Such sales, you have seen, the United States had always a right to prohibit; and by the above mentioned stipulation this right became a duty. These, sir, are the foundations of the orders which have been given to prevent the sale of the prizes lately carried into Boston by the captured privateer, the Betty Cathcart; and those orders which have since been made general, and communicated to the collectors in all the ports of the United States. But, at present, those orders are confined to prizes brought into our ports by privateers.

I have the honor, &c.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, the 21st Vendémiaire, (October 12, 1796, O. S.)

5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sr:

The French privateer Leo took into Charleston an English vessel called the Mary. The English consul required that the sale of this vessel should be prohibited, in virtue of the 24th article of the treaty concluded between the King of Great Britain and the United States.

The Government of South Carolina, uncertain as to the interpretation which the 24th article should receive, determined to bring the case before the Federal courts. In the meantime, the French privateer sold the Mary. The latter vessel was condemned, and the sale was commenced. It was stayed by a warrant in the hands of the marshal, who obliged the agents of the privateer to appear before the admiralty.

A decision, rendered by the chief justice (Ellsworth) in a special court, interdicted the sale of the prize, in virtue of the 24th article of the treaty concluded between Great Britain and England. This decision was confirmed by the circuit court of Carolina, and, when they were going to throw in an appeal to the Supreme Court, the circular letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to the sale of our prizes, was made known, and it was conceived that an appeal became useless.

In the mean time, the vessel being ready to sink, she was examined and condemned. The privateer agents, of whom Judge Ellsworth took a bond of 10,000 dollars as a security that they would not sell the prize, solicited permission to export the cargo in neutral vessels: this was refused, and the cargo, which consisted of 87,000 pounds of sugar, became a prey to the flames, during the fire at Charleston. Permission, however, has been given to export a trifling part of the cargo, saved from the conflagration.

The condemned vessel was purchased and repaired by an American. His project was to go and sell her in the Antilles; but he was obliged to abandon her, and to cancel his bargain, because he was refused American papers.

The privateer agents then wished to send off this vessel, in ballast, with French papers; the collector of the customs, Mr. Holmes, opposed it, and the vessel remains in the port of Charleston, notwithstanding the protest of the French consul of the 16th Fructidor.

Such is the fact of which the consent of Charleston has rendered me an account, about which I spoke to you yesterday, and to which I call your attention. Such is the violation of our treaty, against which I solicit your justice.

The 17th article of our treaty secures to our privateers the faculty of entering into the ports of the United States, and the profit out of them with their prizes. The 24th article of the treaty concluded with Great Britain in truth intercepts the privateers of the country, at war with that Power, from entering the ports of the United States; but, by the 25th article, our rights are acknowledged, and the Government has assured me that it would maintain them. Our privateers have, therefore, the liberty of freely bringing in and landing their prizes. Their agents have requested, and should then go out of the port of Charleston, without any obstacle, as she entered there; and, therefore, the collector of the customs violated our treaty when he prevented her going out.

But how shall I qualify the refusal given to the agents of the privateer Leo to export, in neutral vessels, the cargo of this prize? Upon what can such an act be supported? Is there, in the treaty concluded with Great Britain, any explicit stipulation which can be brought forward? Doubtless, there is none; and yet, because our treaty does not contain, in an explicit manner, the right of selling our prizes, it is contested with and refused to us! By a forced interpretation of the treaty concluded with Great Britain, will it be found that we have not the right to export, in a case of necessity, the cargo of our prizes in neutral vessels? This manner of reasoning is, beyond a doubt, inadmissible, and a just and impartial man will never use it. Besides, facts support what I have the honor of saying to you, since the permission, which was refused at first, was afterwards granted. The state of things had not been changed, and the collector had no more right to refuse the customs than he had to prevent the export in neutral vessels, after the conflagration of Charleston, why did he not allow it before? He was, therefore, moved, not by the spirit of justice which ought to direct his actions, but by a partiality of which it is difficult to give an account; for he should merely have taken care, according to the orders transmitted to him, that the prize was not sold in the United States and it was not for him under any pretext to give a greater extent than really existed to the stipulations of the treaty concluded with the English, in order to make them bear heavily on us. Does this conduct appear to the agent of a neutral Government? In consequence of it, have I not a right to require that the collector of the customs be punished for having violated the treaty, on the one hand, and, having certainly exceeded the powers of the privateer, he has a right to do? I could wish, sir, it were in my power here to stop my just complaints; but there are other facts which I cannot pass over in silence, and of which it is requisite I should inform you.

The ship Cathcart has carried into Wilmington, in North Carolina, the Betty Cathcart and the Aaron, prizes made upon the English.

The sale of these prizes has been prohibited. They were very leaky. Two tradesmen, named by the collector James Read, have certified that they could not be sold out again to sea. The privateer and her agents, however, wished to make the sale. The collector then sold them, upon the basis of the 24th article of the treaty concluded with Great Britain. But I now have that article before me, and I see no stipulation which could authorize the collector, James Read, to take the step he has done.

Notwithstanding the solicitations and protestations of the agents of the privateer against his refusal, James Read still persisted in it, although the leaks of the Betty Cathcart were such that she made between thirty and forty inches of water in an hour. In this latter circumstance, he founds his conduct on the orders of Government.
I cannot believe, sir, that the collector, James Read, then advanced a fact. I cannot believe that the Federal Government, by hindering the unloading of prizes not in a condition to go to sea, thereby wished to aggravate the conditions of a treaty made with our enemies, when they are already so disadvantageous to us. I cannot believe that it wished to do so, but I move, to add to the wrongs which the English well know how to do us by their treaty with the United States, but be this as it may, it is no less true that the officers and crew of the Bellona, as well as those of the Leio, have experienced considerable losses by the conduct of the collectors of the customs of Charleston and Wilmington; that these collections have been unnecessarily exacted, that on the one hand, our treaty has been violated, and, on the other, an arbitrary proceeding, which cannot be justified by any means, has been allowed against French citizens coming into your ports, under the faith of previous treaties and conventions, and when they were in no way notified that these conventions were changed. It is no less true, that these citizens have experienced real damage from the wrongs of the official persons who, therefore, are to be considered as one satisfied another. This is what I request, sir, in the name of justice, besides invoking your severity against the collectors James Read and Holmes.

I further, that I shall obtain the object of these requests, that the Mary may freely go out under a French flag, and that I shall have only a satisfactory account to render to my Government under these circumstances; but, in order to avoid in future claims of a like nature, I request you to be pleased to answer the following questions:
1. Will the prizes made by the ships of the republic upon the English continue to be sold here?
2. Will the vessels and masters only be deprived of the advantages which the French have under the conditions of treaties previously entered into?
3. Shall we unconditionally enjoy the right of unloading the prizes in case of damage, and of having them repaired?
4. Can a part of the prize, sufficient only for the expense of repairs, be sold?

It is useless, sir, for me to enter into any detail to lead you to conceive how important it is for the interests of our masters, that I should be able to say to them in a precise manner what they are to expect on coming into your ports.

I shall be much obliged to you, also, if you will be pleased to answer me as speedily as possible, in order that I may inform my Government of your ulterior resolutions. Accept, &c.

No. 111.

Secretary of State to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 15, 1796.

SIR: On the 13th ult. I had the honor to receive your letter of the 12th, but not possessing of any information on the subject, I laid it before the Secretary of the Treasury, under whose immediate superintendence the collectors of the customs are placed. He has favored me with the letters of the collectors of Charleston and Wilmington, against whom you complain, with sundry documents describing their proceedings in regard to the British ship Amity, (which you call the Mary,) that was carried into the port of Charleston, as a prize to the French privateer Leo; and to the British ship Betty Caskhart and the snow Aaron, which were carried into the port of Wilmington, as prizes to the French privateer Bellona.

If the French consul at Charleston, Mr. Dupont, had correctly stated the facts respecting the ship Amity, I trust you would have found no cause to complain against the collector, Mr. Holmes, whose conduct appears evidently to have been guided by an honest sense of his duty, and the laudable spirit of a citizen, when he saw the laws and authority of his country treated with disrespect. Permit me, then, to state the case from the papers now before me.

On the 7th of April last the privateer Leo carried her prize, the Amity, into Charleston. The prize was entered at the custom house, and security given, as usual, for the duties on her cargo. The Federal court being in session, the British vice consul applied and obtained an injunction prohibiting the sale of the prize.

Then the captors represented to the collector, that the prize ship was so disabled that she could not proceed to the nearest French port, agreeably to our treaty with France. Thereupon the collector directed a survey of the ship to be made. The persons who surveyed her reported, on the 30th May, various defects in her bottom, beams, decks, masts, yards, rigging, and sails, to prove her to be unfit for sea; and Mr. Vessey, an agent for the captors, asserted, that the ship was incapable of being fitted for sea, and that it was impossible for her to be refitted so as to carry her cargo to any foreign port, a cargo of the immense weight of near six hundred hogheads of sugar, rum, &c. Hence it is that the British captors have been allowed to prize good in other bottoms; and, after taking advice, which confirmed his opinion, he, on the application of the agents, gave the requisite permission. And, in consequence, "the greatest part of the cargo was shipped in neutral bottoms for the benefit of the drawback, the duties having been previously secured." Thus far all was very well; and I cannot but observe, that the proceedings of the collector are marked with liberality.

But now the difficulties began. After the survey had been made, and the greatest part of the cargo shipped in neutral bottoms, the captors, or their agents, in defiance of the laws of the United States (for the British treaty had then become a public law) and in direct contempt of the injunction of the Federal court, sold the prize ship to American citizens; and the French consul, Mr. Dupont, sanctioned the sale. The purchasers immediately repaired the prize ship, which had been declared to be irreparable, and applied to the collector for her clearance as an American vessel. The collector, seeing the deception which had been practised upon him, and considering the violation of the laws, and the contempt of the authority of the United States, very properly refused his concurrence to render those deceitful and illegal acts finally successful.

Your letter, grounded on Mr. Dupont's information, and a memorial of Messrs. North and Vessey to the Secretary of the Treasury, state that the collector refused permission to issue the prize cargo on board neutral vessels until after a part of it had been destroyed by fire. But there was a considerable interval between the date of the report to the collector, and the date of the refusal, as early as the 30th of May, that the prize cargo might lawfully be carried away in neutral or other bottoms, the prize ship having been considered as irreparable. It hence appears highly improbable, and nearly impossible, that after the 30th of May, the collector should have refused his permission to export the cargo in neutral vessels. If the interval between the 30th of May and the 13th of June, (when it seems the great fire happened at Charleston) it is possible that no application was made to the collector to permit the exportation of the cargo in neutral vessels. But at no time was the collector disposed to throw unnecessary difficulties in the way and his surenergies in this case as new as it was important, continued only until he obtained advice which sound discretion required him to ask.

You are under a mistake about the portion of the prize cargo which was destroyed by fire. Permit me to exhibit the facts as stated by Messrs. North and Vessey, the agents for the prize. The cargo of the ship Amity consisted of 490 hogheads of sugar, wt. gross, 87,999 lbs. 70 barrels do. do. 70,870

490 hogheads of sugar, wt. gross, 87,999 lbs.

310 bags of pimento, 35,130 lbs. pounds.

27 hogs of rum, 2,923 gallons.

Consumed in the fire at Charleston, June 13th, 52 hogs. of sugar; 50,229 lbs.

Which is but little more than a tenth part of the cargo, and it is not intimated that any other part of her cargo was destroyed.
From this state of facts no blame appears to attach to any officer of the United States. The sale of the prize and her cargo was lawfully prohibited; but, by a liberal construction of the treaty with the French republic, permission was given to export the cargo in other vessels when the prize ship was, in effect, under a proper duty, with its captors, and when furnished with a proper proof of her departure. It is true, that, of the proofs, and acknowledgment of the sale to those American citizens, after the American flag had for several days been flying on board her, he refused to permit her departure as a French prize he refused her to the consul Dupont, who, not respecting the laws and authority of the United States, knowingly sanctioned the sale: and under all these circumstances, will not his refusal be deemed excusable? In respect to the two prizes carried into Wilmington, in North Carolina, the decision of the crew, I should believe of the collector, Mr. Read, any designated rigor, beyond the requisitions of the laws of the United States. In his letter of the 26th of July to the Secretary of the Treasury, which is now before me, he manifests a desire merely to perform his duty according to his conception of the meaning of the laws; but requests instructions for his guide. On the 30th of August (the day after his letter was received) the Secretary wrote him directions, particularly to permit the unlading of the prizes, if, upon examination, it appeared necessary to the repairing of them. The collector's temporary opposition to this measure arose evidently from a mistaken construction of a former letter from the Secretary of the Treasury. This mistake was promptly corrected; and it is now original in two months since they were going to unload both vessels. Any damage that may have ensued from the involuntary errors of the collector, the captors or their agents will do well to state for consideration. With respect to the losses which may have been sustained by the captors of the prize ship Amity, at Charleston, the documents with which I have been furnished prove that they must be the result of their own misconduct, or of an accident which no human foresight could prevent. If the agents of the prize shall produce counter proofs, they will receive all due consideration.

To the four questions stated in your letter, I am pleased to accept the following answers:

"1st. Will the prizes made by the ships of the republic upon the English continue to be sold here?" I have had the honor, in some former letters, to state to you the sense of the Government on this point, with the reasons to support it. Permission to sell prizes was considered by the Government not demandable as of right. The Power permitting could therefore restrain the sales. The only restraint yet imposed has respected captures made by privateers.

"2d. Will the prizes made by the privateers of the republic upon others than the English be sold?" As the original permission to sell prizes extended to those taken from all the enemies of the French republic, and as the restraint lately imposed refers merely to British vessels, pursuant to the article of the treaty just mentioned, so the indulgence, in other respects, is to be considered as respected.

"3d. Shall we unconditionally enjoy the right of unlading the prizes in case of damage, and of having them repaired?" The right of unlading prize vessels, when they are so damaged as to be unfit to proceed to sea without repairs, will not be counterverted; but the unlading and storing of the cargoes must be under the inspection of the proper officers of the United States, as a necessary precaution against a transgression of our laws. And in case the prize vessels are really irreparable, and in consequence are regularly condemned as unfit ever to proceed to sea, their cargoes may be exported as French property, in other bottoms.

"4th. Can a part of the prize, sufficient only for the expense of the repairs, be sold?" So much of the prize cargo may be sold as shall bona fide be necessary for the repairs, without which the vessel will be unfit to proceed to sea. But such sales must be made under the inspection of the collectors, pursuant to the instructions of the Treasury Department, for securing the duties on imports, and confining the amount of the sales to the necessity of each case.

With respect to the ship Amity at Charleston, the collector of that port will be instructed to permit her departure as a French prize.

The letter substance, as it now appears, was prepared to be sent you in the last month; but doubts arose on some points, concerning which legal opinions were taken, and occasioned the further delay to this time.

I have the honor to be, &c.

No. 142.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 19th November, (9th Jan. 1796, G. S.)

4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: Instructed to watch over the interests of my country, instructed not to allow either its rights or its honor to be violated, instructed to maintain peace and good harmony between France and the United States, I pray the confidence of my Government, and the duties which my station impose on me, were I now to remain silent on a circumstance which must make all France discontented, and were I not to hasten to give you information of it.

When the National Convention decreed that the French flag should be presented by its minister to the United States, there was but one opinion as to the place in which it should be deposited. A decree had placed yours in the hall of the legislative body. Every one thought that the French flag would with you receive the same honor; all my fellow-citizens have, one after another, contemplated that pledge of your friendship, and each one believed that the Americans would also have the same eagerness to view the symbol of the enfranchisement of a friendly nation, who, like them, had purchased their liberty at the price of their liberty.

This expectation has not been fulfilled, and it has been decided that the French flag should be shut up among the archives. Whatever may be the expression of friendship in the answer of the President,—however amicable, also, are the relations of the House of Representatives,—I cannot doubt, sir, that the order made for preserving a flag, which the republic sent only to the United States, will be looked upon by it as a mark of contempt or indifference. Pride, sir, you know, is the portion of a free people; and it is never wounded but at the expense of friendship. The present circumstances are extremely delicate; and when I am convinced the American Government had no intention of受到 the French republic to think that the gift of her flag was worth nothing in its eyes, should it not give authentic proofs of it? Would it not be convenient to fix this flag in a similar place to that which yours occupies in France, and where the national honor expected to see it?

I venture to believe, sir, that when I make you this proposition, you will know how to appreciate my intentions, and that you will not, by this step, the man, who, from a regard to character, endeavors to prevent every cause of altercation between the Governments of two people united by the same interests.

Accept, sir, &c.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 15, 1796.

Sir: I have received your letter of the 9th, indicating your regrets at the disposition which has been made of the colors you presented to the United States, and your opinion that all France will be dissatisfied.

No. 144.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States of America to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

Philadelphia, 12th Ventose, (March 3, 1796, O. S.)

4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR:

Some periodical works, and particularly the Directory printed at Philadelphia, have come out this year with an alteration against which it is my duty to complain.

The French ministers have always enjoyed the precedence as to those of England, not only in the United States, but throughout the world; and France, as a republic, has preserved, and will preserve, the rank she has held in the diplomatic corps under her ancient regime.

The French people look upon all peoples as equal and as brothers; but they will never suffer that partial distinctions, contrary to custom, should be granted directly, or indirectly, to any State whatever.

If the foreign agents near your republic have hitherto been arranged in the Directory and other almanacs of the United States, in the order of rank appertaining to their respective powers.

This year the agents of Great Britain, who enjoy only the third rank, have there been placed before those of France and Spain.

It is usual, sir, for almanacs of this kind to be corrected under the direction of Governments, and with their approbation. I should presume that this is not the case in the United States, since they would have noticed the alteration against which I complain.

If I am mistaken in this respect, as I ought to suppose that this change is only an error, I shall confine myself, sir, to requesting you to have it rectified by suppressing the publication and the distribution of the Directory and other almanacs in which it has been committed.

But if, as I imagine, these works are the property of individuals, and the Government of the United States can exercise no influence as to their correction, in this case, as their publication, although free, has taken place under the protection of the American laws, and if the alteration therein made should not be contradicted, the public may conclude either that it has been consented to by the Government of the United States, and acquiesced in by me, or that the French republic desires and has always, as a republic and as a nation, preserved this rank.

I pray you, sir, to be pleased to declare in writing, that the Government of the United States have no concern in the printing of the Directory and other works of that kind, in which the agents of the French republic near the United States have been registered this year after those of Great Britain, against the usage and the right of precedence, which belongs to the French republic; and to permit me to publish in the newspapers your answer or declaration which I have the honor to request.

Accept, sir, my sentiments of respect and esteem.

No. 145.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to Mr. ADET, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 14, 1796.

SIR: I received your letter of the 3d instant, complaining of an alteration introduced into some periodical works, particularly the Directory printed at Philadelphia, in which the names of foreign agents in the United States are so arranged, that those of Great Britain precede those of France; although (you observe) not only in the United States, but in all the world, France has always enjoyed, in the diplomatic line, the precedence of Great Britain.

You rightly imagine, sir, that works of this kind are not here, as in Europe, edited under the direction of Government. They are all the property of individuals, who print what they please, and in such order as their ideas of propriety may dictate.
priety, or humor, or accident, may direct. The contents of such annual works are usually confined to facts, the details of which are not of a nature to be subjected to any legal regulation.

Concerning the mode in which the summary of foreign Powers in the United States to have originated in an error, without any direction from the Government, "you request that the error may be corrected, by a suppression of the publication and distribution of the Directory and other almanacs, in which the same error has been committed." But, sir, this is impossible. These works are, as I have before observed, the property of private owners, who, having adhered against any law, can be subjected to no penalty or loss. The press in the United States, you must have, sir, is perfectly free. Not to trouble you with any more remarks, I will close this letter with noting the manner in which the foreign diplomatic characters in the United States have been arranged in a like annual publication in this number.

In the last number of the Register for 1796, those from the French republic, the United Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Prussia, and last of all those from Great Britain.

It is not necessary for me to express any opinion whether this arrangement is erroneous or correct, or whether, among the various aspects of our sovereign interest, in the public, and, therefore, the part of the subject, the existence of the impression, is not until my reply was received and fully weighed; and I have now the pleasure to transmit you the result of the communication which afterwards took place between the minister and myself on that subject.

"I do not know what effect my reply has had upon the mind of the Directory, because it was only sent in a few days. I shall endeavor to ascertain this if possible, and, in case I do, will immediately afterwards apprise you of it.

"I think proper here to communicate to you an incident which took place between the minister and myself, after I had originated from the Directory a promise that he should state the objections above referred to, and discuss their merits with me, and which was, as herefore, intimated to you on the 8th of March last. During that period I received from the minister the communication promised, in a note of the same date, but differing in some other respects from the present one, and particularly in the number of complaints, two of the catalogue being now given up by him, and to which I replied as I could prepare my reply, in a note bearing likewise the same date with that which I now enclose you. After he had perused my reply, he was sensible that he had insisted on some points that were not tenable, and, in consequence, asked that I would permit him to retake his note, returning mine, that he might correct himself, and, of course, that I would consider the discussion as yet to be commenced. I told him the completion of the communication I would undertake with pleasure, and that I would consider myself in the light of a solicitor bound to catch at and take advantage of little errors; that I wished, upon all occasions, and with every one, and especially upon the present occasion with him, to act with candor, and, in consequence, I soon afterwards restored him his note and took back my own.

"At the time when I made the minister this promise, I thought it in my power to comply with it. I had, it is true, according to custom, written and enclosed you a copy of both papers; but yet I thought Doctor Brockenhour, to whom I entrusted my letter for you, was in France, within my reach, that I might recover it. Upon inquiry, however, I found that he had departed, by way of Dunkirk, for England, a route I knew he intended to take, and in which state of things all that I could do was to write and request him to return me that letter, and which I immediately did. I have not yet heard from him, and, of course, cannot tell whether I shall recover it or not. As soon, however, as I knew he was gone, I apprized the minister of it, as likewise of the above circumstances, satisfying him that I had written him in good faith, and that I could only rely on a repetition of the same, if he would take care, and, in communicating the above to you, I do it as well to explain this transaction, and which will require explanation in case you receive that letter, as to make known to you, as far as depends on me, the condition on which I have received it.

"The minister thought proper to give his second communication the same date with the former one, although more than a fortnight had intervened between the one and the other; and, in consequence, I followed his example, giving my latter reply the same date with the former one. His motive I did not inquire into; mine was that the Directory might see that the delay which took place did not proceed from me."

No. 147.

Summary statement of the complaints of the French republic against the Government of the United States.

First complaint.—The in execution of the treaties.

1st. The courts of justice of the United States have taken and still take cognizance of prizes which our privateers conduct into their ports, notwithstanding the express clause of the treaty against it. Our ministers have proposed various arrangements for limiting these usurpations. The Federal Government has not yet made answer on this subject; the first propositions were not accepted, and the latter measures fell into disuse. The disgusts, the delays, the losses resulting to our seamen from such a state of things, are palpable. They almost entirely deprive the American statesmen of the advantage which they may expect from the particular article of the treaty.

2d. The admission of English ships of war, even in cases where they are excluded by the 17th article of the treaty, that is, when they have made prizes on the republic or on its citizens. The weakness with which the Federal Government conceded this point, in the first instance, has increased the pretensions of Great Britain, and now the matter is pressed with such importunity that, without further delay, the United States, in every respect, the promises has there victualled his ships in order to cruise on the American commerce, and to pillage our property. This division carries its authority even to the conducting thither its prizes.

3d. The consular convention, forming a part of our treaties, is equally unexecuted in its two most important clauses: the first, granting the absolute right in all cases, and the second, the exclusive decision in disputes arising between Frenchmen, becomes illusory, for the want of laws giving to the consuls the means of having their decisions executed. The consequence of this inability tends to annul the prerogative of our consuls, and materially to injure the interest of our merchants.

The second gives to our consuls the right of causing our mariners who desert to be arrested. The execution of this part of the convention affects both all expression, our maritime service, during the stay of our vessels in the American ports. The judges charged by the laws with issuing the mandates of arrest, have last restored the presentation of the original of the roll of the crew, in contempt of the 5th article, admitting, that the consuls, not only received the presentation of the original roll, and then the seamen are not liable to be apprehended. 4th. The arrestation, in the port of Philadelphia, in the month of August, 1793, of the captain of the corvette the Cassius, for acts committed by him on the high seas. This is contrary to the 19th article of the treaty of commerce, which stipulates "that the commanders of public and of private vessels shall not be detained in any manner"; besides, it violates the most obvious law of nations, which places the officers of public vessels under the safeguard of their flag. The United States have had sufficient proofs of deference on the part of the republic, to count upon its justice in this instance. The captain was imprisoned notwithstanding the consular of the republic produced bail. Scarcely was he set at liberty when the corvette, although regularly armed at the Cape by General LaFoueau, was arrested, and it appears she is still so under pretext that, eight months before she sailed from Philadelphia suspected of having armed in that port.

Second complaint.—The impunity of the outrage committed on the republic in the person of its minister, the citizen Fauchet, by the vice of the vessel, the Annazon, at the port of Nantes.

The administration of the waters of the United States of the packet boat having citizen Fauchet on board, the search made in the trunks of that minister, with the avowed object of seizing his person and papers, merited an example. The insult was committed on the 1st of August, 1793, (O. S.) the shop all the rest of the month blocked up the Medina frigate, belonging to the United States, and they kept her 20 days without the slightest provocation. For a new outrage on the United States by a menacing letter, the exequatur was withdrawn from the consul merely for having taken a part in the latter insult.

Third complaint.—The treaty concluded in November, 1794, between the United States and Great Britain. It is well known at present war, although occasionally suspended, and is the most essential and least contested prerogatives of neutrality.

1st. The United States, besides having departed from the principles established by the armed neutrality during the war; they have tacitly acknowledged the pretensions raised by the English to create a serious conflict in our colonies, and even in France, by the force of a bare proclamation. This abandonment of the independence of their commerce is incompatible with their neutrality. Mr. Jefferson has himself acknowledged it in his letter of 7th September, to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at London, on the subject of the peaceful interposition of the United States respecting the execution of the King of Great Britain, from whom the commerce of the United States as well as their national honor have suffered so much, a result quite different was hoped from the negotiation of Mr. Jay. It is evident by the clause of the treaty limiting the protection of the American vessels to the territorial waters of England and to the sea bordering that country. Mr. Monroe is left to judge how far these concessions accord with the obligation contracted by the United States to defend our colonial possessions, and with the no less sacred duties imposed on them by the immense and invariable benefits which they draw from their commerce with them.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs.

PARIS, 10th Vendote, (March 3, 1796.)

14th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

No. 146.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the French Republic.

PARIS, 25th Vendote, (15th of March, 1796.) 4th year of the French republic, and 30th of the independence of the United States of America.

Citizen Minister:

I was lately honored with your note of the 19th of Vendote, (9th of March) objecting to several of the measures of our Government that have occurred in the course of the present war, and to which, I presume, I shall herein render you a satisfactory answer. For this purpose, I shall pursue, in reply, the order you have observed in stating your objections, the first, according to the laid aside, will be one of the subject of what merits. These objections are comprised under three distinct heads, a summary of which I will first expose, that my reply to each may be better understood.

1st. Your first complaint is, that we have failed to execute our treaties with you, and in the following respects: 1st.-By submitting to our tribunals the cognizance of prizes brought into our ports by your privateers. 2d. By admitting English vessels of war into our ports against the stipulation of the 17th article of our treaty of commerce, even after such vessels had taken prizes from you, and, in some cases, with their prizes. 3d. By omitting to execute the judicial clauses in the treaties, as means for carrying those clauses into effect, the first of which secures to your consuls within the United States the exclusive jurisdiction of all controversies between French citizens, and the second the right to pursue and recover all masters who desert from your vessels. 4th. By suffering, in the port of Philadelphia, the arrestation of the captain of the corvette Cassius for an act committed by him on the high seas, and which you say is contrary to the 19th article of the treaty of commerce, which stipulates "that the commandants of public and private vessels shall not be detained in any manner," and the rights of nations, which put such officers under the protection of their respective flags. And by likewise suffering the arrestation of that corvette, though armed at the Cape, upon the pretext that she was armed in the United States.

2d. Your second complaint states that an outrage which was made to this republic in the person of its minister, citizen Fauchet, by an English vessel (the Africa) in concert with an English consular, in arresting, within the jurisdiction of the United States, the packet boat in which he had embarked from all the tyrannical acts of the King of Great Britain, for which the consular of the United States and most insistent and least contested prerogatives of neutrality. This abandonment was committed on the 1st of August, 1793, (O. S.) the shop all the rest of the month blocked up the Medina frigate, belonging to the United States, and they kept her 20 days without the slightest provocation. For a new outrage on the United States by a menacing letter, the exequatur was withdrawn from the consul merely for having taken a part in the latter insult.

3d. Your third and last complaint applies to our late treaty with England, and which you say not only sacrifices in favor of that Power our treaties with France, but departs from that line of impartiality which, as a neutral nation, we have a right to observe. The principal objections are given of this charge in your note, and which I shall particularly notice when I come to reply to it.

This is a summary of your complaints, and to each of which I will now give a precise, and, I flatter myself, a satisfactory answer.

1. Of the inexecution of our treaties with this republic, and of the first example given of it, "the submission to our tribunals of the cognizance of prizes brought into our ports by your privateers."

Permit me, in reply to this charge, to ask whether you insist, as a general principle, that our tribunals are inhibited from exercising the right of cognizance of the validity of your prizes, in all cases, or are there exceptions to it? As a general principle, without exception, I cannot, I think, be insisted on, because examples may be given under it of possible cases, which prove it cannot be so construed and executed without an encroachment upon the inherent and unalienable rights of sovereignty in both nations, which neither intended to make, nor does the treaty warrant.
Suppose, for instance, a prize was taken within our jurisdiction, not upon the high sea, nor even at the entrance or mouth of any of those great rivers or bays which, as I formerly mentioned, are part of our continent, but on the ocean, on the high sea, of one of our cities, that is to say, within the jurisdiction of one of our cities, not over which our tribunals, or some other branch of our Government, have not to take cognizance. Do you conceive that the true import of the treaty imposes upon us, and likewise upon you in turn, the obligation thus to abandon a theatre of warfare in which you bear no part the interior of your own country? Can you, I ask you, take part in the contest and, when you have pos- ited that the privateer which took the prize, and led it into port, was fitted out within the United States, the act being unauthorized by treaty: could we tolerate this, and refuse the like liberty to the other nation at war, without departing from that line of neutrality we ought to observe, in accordance with which we have been secured by treaty? Do you think we can, and, if these are transcended, that the nation so acting makes itself a party to the war, and, in consequence, merits to be considered and treated as such. These examples prove that there are some exceptions to the general princi- ples, and perhaps others to the general principles to which we are to adhere in question, and that the System of treaties, which gives us no rule to which we are to adhere in the present case.

You will observe that I admit the principle, if a prize was taken upon the high sea, and by a privateer fitted out within the republic or its dominions, that, in such a case, our courts have no right to take cognizance of its validity: but is any case of this kind alleged? I presume none is, or can be alleged, for the basis of a treaty, in contravention of the 17th article of the treaty of commerce, we have admitted British vessels of war into our ports, even such as have taken prizes from you, and, in some cases, with their prizes. The article referred to stipulates the right of vessels of war and privateers to enter our ports with their prizes, and inhibits that right to foreign na- mes. It does not stipulate that the vessels of war belonging to your enemies shall not enter, but simply that they shall not enter with their prizes. This latter act is, I presume, therefore, the subject of your complaint. Here, it only stipulates that, in case such vessels enter your or our ports, proper measures shall be taken to compel them to deliver up the prizes, if any there be, to the right party, but that is not a case to which I cannot decide, as I know nothing about it. Our coast is extensive, our harbors numerous, and the distress of the weather may have forced them into us or may have entered wantonly, and in contempt of the authority of our Government. Many outrages have been committed on the high sea, and the vessel in question, and that is the act which gives rise to such complaints. But I cannot venture to affirm that no countenance was given by our Government to those vessels, whilst they were there, and that all suitable means were taken to compel them to retire, and without delay. You know we have no fleet, and that difficult it is without entering to execute a stipulation of this kind with that promptitude which your agents in our country, or useful to your cause, and faithful to your interest, might expect.

3. The third article under this head states that we have omitted to execute the consular convention in two of its most important clauses, the first of which secures to the consuls of each nation in the ports of the other the exclusive right of residence, and of living in each city, of which gives to the consuls a right to recover such mariners as desert from the vessels of their respective nations.

Upon the first point, the supposed incompetency of the law, provided, on our part, to execute the judgments of your consuls within our jurisdictions, I shall say, that the basis of this subject.-

And upon the second, which states that the judges charged by our law to issue war- rants for arresting such of your mariners as desert from their vessels, have latterly required, and against the spirit of the treaty, the presentation of the original registers of the vessels to which they belonged, as the ground whereon to decide whether the mariners were in the service of the nation, I have to observe, as laid by the law itself, that this has not been required, and that the copies spoken of in another part of the treaty, (the fifth article) obviously apply to other objects, and not to this. More fully, however, to explain to you the conduct of our Government upon this subject, permit me here to add an extract from our law, passed on the 14th of April, 1792, expressly to carry into effect the convention in question, and which applies to both cases. The three princes of the United States shall, within their respective districts, be the competent judges for the purposes expressed in the ninth article of the said convention, and it shall be incumbent on them to give aid to the consuls and vice consuls of France, in arresting and se- curing deserters from those vessels of war or privateers which sail under your ensign, in conformity with the said treaty. And, for that purpose, a copy of such convention, the consuls and vice consuls of France are entitled to the aid of the competent officers of the United States, to the execution of any precept, the marshals of the United States, and their deputies, shall, within their respective districts, be the competent officers, and shall give their aid, according to the tenor of the said convention. By this law you will find that our Government has, in no manner, attempted to frustrate or embarrass the execution of this treaty: on the contrary, that it was its intention to carry it into full effect, according to its true intent and meaning, and that it has done so, so far as it could be done by suitable legal provisions.

As, however, be regarded, be deemed a subject worthy consideration, whether the first of these clauses in that convention had not better be expunged from it. The principle of a foreign court, established within any country, with jurisdiction independent of that country, cannot well be reconciled with any correct idea of its sovereignty; nor can it exercise its functions properly, in harmony with the authorities of the country, and which naturally occur, to recover such mariners as desert from the vessels of their respective nations.

4. Your fourth and last example under this head, states that the captain of the corvette Cassius was arrested, in Philadelphia, for an act committed on the high sea, contrary, as you suggest, to the nineteenth article of the treaty of commerce, which stipulates that the owners and commanders of the said Cassius, and all the well known rights of nations, which put the officers of public vessels under the safe- guard of their respective flags, and that the said corvette was, likewise, seized, though armed at the Cape, upon the pretext that she was armed, some time before, in Philadelphia.

Conclusively, with the exceptions I have indicated, the officer of the law, whereof the captain was charged, I can, of course, give no explanation on that head. Satisfied, however, I am, that, if the crime was of a nature to authorize our courts to take cognizance of it, he would not be exempted from their jurisdiction by the article of the treaty in question, since that article, as you will perceive, was intended to establish a general principle in the case, because it gives no privilege to the ships of war of each, to enter and retire from the ports of the other, and not to secure, in favor of any particular delinquent, an immunity from crimes: nor, in my opinion, does the law of nations admit of a different construction, or give any other protection. I am happy, however, to hear that he is released, since it furnishes an additional proof that the whole transaction was a judicial one, regular, according to the course of our law, and mingling nothing in it, in any view, that ought to give offence here.

The next is the 4th article of the said treaty; and in the context that the vessel armed in Philadelphia, I have only to say, that, if she was armed there, it was the duty of our Government to seize her; the right to arm not being stipulated by treaty; and, if that was alleged upon sufficient testimony, as I presume was the case, there was no other way of determining the question than by an examination into it, and, in the interim, preventing her sailing. It would have been a matter of some difficulty to examine her, particularly if a vessel of commerce; and, to this end, the decision was against her. On the contrary, such conduct would not only justly expose us to the charge of committing a breach of neutrality, but of, likewise, doing it conclusively.

2. Your second complaint states an outrage which was committed by a British frigate upon your minister, the citizen James Earle, as was also the case with a vessel of the United States, in hearing the packet in which he embarked, opening his trunks, &c., within the waters of the United States, and remaining there afterwards, to watch the movements of the frigate in which he sailed, and which, you say, was not resented as it ought to have been, by our Government, since you add, the outrage which was taken by it, in regard to that vessel and the consul, were the effect of another and subsequent outrage.

The outrage which was inflicted by our Government upon the parties who committed that outrage, by revolving the exequatur of the consul, and ordering that all supplies should be withheld from the frigate, as, likewise, that she should forthwith depart without the waters of the United States, was, I think you will admit, an adequate one for the offence. Certain it is, that, as we have no fleet, it was the only one in our power to inflict, and that this outrage was inflicted in consequence of that outrage. You will, I presume, likewise admit, after you have perused the act of the President upon that subject, a copy of which I herewith transmit to you, and by which you will perceive that there was, in truth, no distinct outrage offered to the United States, upon that occasion, by the parties in question, but that both the one and the other act (the attempt made upon the packet boat in which your minister had embarked, by the captain of a British frigate, and which constituted the first, and the writing of an insolent letter, by the same captain, to the Governor of Rhode Island, in concert with the British consul there, and which constituted the second) were only several incidents to the same transaction, forming, together, a single offence, and for which that outrage was inflicted on those parties.

I think proper here to add, as a further proof that the President was neither inattentive to what was due to your rights of commerce, nor to the relations between our United States, that he gave orders to our minister at London to complain formally to that Government of that outrage, and to demand of it such satisfaction upon the parties, as the nature of the insult required, and which has, doubtless, either been given, or is still expected.

3. Your third article, which is nothing but a protest against the treaty with France, and an intimation, that our relations with that Power, in favor of that Power, our connexion with France, and the rights of neutrality, the most common.

1st. In support of this charge you observe that we have not only departed from the principles of the armed neutrality adopted in the course of the last war, but have abandoned, in favor of England, the limits which the right of nations and our own treaties with all other Powers, and even England, in her treaties with many other Powers, have given to contraband.

2d. That we have also consented that provisions should be deemed contraband, not when destined to a blockaded port only, as should be the case, but in all cases, by tacitly acknowledging the pretensions of England to place at pleasure, and by proclaiming not only your islands, but even France herself, in that category.

The principles of the armed neutrality set on foot by the Empress of Russia, in harmony with the other neutral Powers, at the time you mention, and accorded to by all the Powers then at war against England, are extremely dear to me, and, in many respects, very important to our welfare. Whatever treaty we make with those Powers who are willing to adopt them, and our hope is, that they will soon become universal. But, even in the war of which you speak, and when the combination against England was most formidable, all the maritime Powers being arranged against her, you well know that she never acceded to them. How can I, then, on the present occasion, when that combination was not only broken, but many of the Powers, then parties to it against England, were now enlisted on her side, in support of her principles. You must be sensible that, under these circumstances, it was impossible for us to obtain from that Power the recognition of those principles, and that of course we are not culpable for having failed to accomplish that object.

I regret, also, that we did not succeed in obtaining a more liberal scale of contraband from that Power than was obtained: for, as our articles of exportation are chiefly articles of the first necessity, and always in great demand here, and every where else, it was equally an object of importance to us to enlarge the freedom of commerce in that respect. We are, likewise, in want of a navigation on the part of those neutral Powers, more to the use of which we are. But here, too, the same difficulty occurred that had in the preceding case, and it was in consequence deemed expedient, for the time, to relinquish a point we could not obtain, suffering the ancient law of nations to remain unchanged in any respect. It is urged that we have made any article contraband that was not so before the last war, and that England has the right to prevent us from so doing, because she has a right to daily seize when they fell in her way? This cannot be urged, because the fact is otherwise: for, although we have not annulled the law of nations in that respect, yet certainly we have not changed it for the worse, and which alone can be just cause of complaint.

With respect to the objection stated to a clause in the 18th article of the treaty with England, which presumes we are thereby prohibited bringing provisions from the United States to France, I have only to add that no such prohibition is to be found in it, or other stipulation which changes the law of nations in that respect; on the contrary, that article leaves the law of nations where it was before, authorizing the seizure in those cases only where such provisions are contraband by the "existing law of nations," and according to our construction when carrying to a blockaded port, and in which case payment is stipulated; but in no respect is the law of nations changed, or any right given to the British to seize, other than they had before, and such, I presume, you will agree is the true import of that article.

You will observe, by the article in question, that when our provisions, destined for a blockaded port, are seized, though subject by the law of nations to confiscation, they are, nevertheless, exempted from it, and the owners of such provisions entitled to their value. Surely this stipulation cannot tend to discourage my countrymen from adventuring with provisions into the ports of this republic, nor in any other respect prevent their enterprises. On the contrary, it was not probable that it would produce the opposite effect, since thereby the only penalty which could be inflicted under that article of the said treaty, in that case as above mentioned, was completely done away.

Thus, citizen minister, I have endeavored, according to the views of our Government, and the light I have upon the contrary, the objections you have stated against several of its measures, adopted in the course of the present war, and I hope to your satisfaction. That any occurrence should take place in the annals of the two republics, which garrison would have been, or that your countrymen, our since you mention it, have not since that time exposed to, a circumstance that cannot otherwise give pain to our Government and our people. That these, however, should be removed by a fair and candid examination of your complaints, on both sides, is the best consolation that such an occurrence can admit of. If, by my feeble efforts, I contribute in any degree to promote that end, and preserve these nations, whom it is my sacred trust always to assist, I accomplish an object the most grateful to my feelings that I can possibly accomplish.

 Permit me, in concluding this letter, to assure you of the great respect and esteem with which I am your obedient and very humble servant,
The special agents of the Executive Directory to the Windward Islands, considering that the laws, as well ancient as modern, forbid neutrals to carry to the enemy contraband or prohibited merchandises; considering that, notwithstanding the complaints of the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic to the United States of North America, of which he informed us by a letter of the 14th Messidor, those States, and particularly Virginia, have fitted out vessels laden with horses for the English;

PHILADELPHIA, 22d Thermidor, (10th August, 1795, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:

The neutrality of the United States, and the law of nations, have just been violated in the most serious manner. It is but too true that the English wished to take citizen Fauchet and his papers from on board one of your vessels, and in the waters of the United States. The letters from citizens Fauchet and Picchon, that of the consul at Newport, the affidavit of the passengers of the packet the Peggy, leave no doubt upon this wicked attempt.

I should not have spoken to you at all on the subject if the French republic had not been outraged. But you know, as well I do, sir, that a minister, on quitting his functions, does not, on that account, lose his privileges, or his rights; that he retains them until his return to the power by whom he was sent. His safety, his inviolability, are as much under the safeguard of the law of nations as those of a minister exercising his functions, and you owe him the same protection. Nations are agreed in this principle; it is mentioned by the authors who have written on the public law, and you will find it reported in Vattel, (§ 125, chap. 9, book 4, vol. 3, Amsterdam edition, 1775.)

The premeditated insult against the citizen Fauchet, therefore, is at once an injury against the United States and the French republic. I should betray my most sacred duty were I not bitterly to complain of it, and, in soliciting you to cause reparation to be made, I were not to pray you to take measures for preventing a similar outrage in future.

It were vain to seek to excuse those who have committed it. In vain would it be said that seamen were ignorant of the laws of nations. They were instruments made use of by men who could not be unequainted with those laws. The English vice consul, Moore, presided on board the Africa on the pillage of the American packet boat; and how could he justify this outrage of which modern Carthage can alone give an example?

Were such an infraction of the laws of nations passed over in silence, what safety should I then find here? Who would prevent the pirates of Great Britain from forcing my house in the night, from carrying me off in one of their vessels, and loading me with iron? What, then, would there be sacred among nations, if the character of a minister were long respected, and if a single nation could always trample every principle, all conventions, under foot, without exciting a murmur or complaint?

It would offend you, sir, were I longer to insist. The honor of your country, the respect you owe to its faithful ally, the attachment you bear to her, will speak much better than I can.

Accept, sir, &c.

The Vice consul of the French republic at Newport Rhode Island to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the said republic near the United States of America.

NEWPORT RHODE ISLAND, the 16th Thermidor, 3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

The most formal violation of the territory of the United States, and the most serious insult, has been committed, and it was a functionary of the republic, citizen Fauchet, who was the object of it.

On Saturday last the packet boat Peggy, coming from New York, and on board of which the minister had embarked, was arrested at about two miles and a half from the light house, by the English ship Africa, lying at anchor, which obliged the captain of the packet to come within a few fathoms of her. The officers sent to visit, on coming on board asked for citizen Fauchet and his trunks, of which they knew the exact number; they were answered that the said citizen had landed at Stonington; they then asked to see his effects, and appeared as though they intended to seize his papers. It was easy to discover their disappointment, when the empty pasteboard cases were presented to them. The most indecent researches were made in the minister's trunks, and in those of citizens Bourmontville and Picchon; some papers belonging to the latter were transported on board of the ship, but were returned.

The design failed; it was citizen Fauchet and his papers that they wished; and by the most fortunate circumstances, he defeated the audacious act projected against him. I had fortunately been advised of the packet boat putting into Stonington, and heaven suggested to me the idea of notifying citizen Fauchet by express of the station of the ship. He was immediately furnished with his papers only, and thence came here by land.

Nothing proves better the fixed intentions of the English to take the citizen Fauchet and his papers than the conduct of the English consul on the same day: at daylight he went on board the Africa, and did not return until after it was ascertained that the project formed by him and his companions in depredation, had failed.

I immediately gave an account of this transaction to the Governor of Rhode Island by sending him a copy of the affidavit of the packet (affidavit du packet) of which I herein enclose another authentic copy, together with one of my letters to the Governor of this State, that you may be enabled to make such application to the Government of the United States as you shall think proper.

Health and fraternity.

Be it known unto all whom it may concern, that on the day of the date hereof, before me, Christopher Ellery, public notary for the county of Newport, in the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, in the United States of America, at Newport, in the State of Rhode Island, Peggy, of Newport, just arrived from New York, and Louis Andrew Pichon, former secretary of the legation of the French republic to the United States, passenger on board said sloop, together with T. A. Hoffer, citizen of Boston, and Captain Chahert, also passengers on board the said sloop, all of whom on their oaths declare, that yesterday, at three of the clock in the afternoon, being the 1st day of August instant, they were at the distance of two miles from the light-house in Narragansett Bay, in said sloop, bound to Newport; when, being opposite to the same, a British ship of war, the Africa, commanded by ———, fired a cannon-shot at the said sloop, as a signal to bring her to; that the sloop had then American colors flying; that the master aforesaid, obeying the signal, soon perceived two boats coming to the sloop from the said ship of war, which boats were manned by a part of the crew of said ship, and out of which came four or five officers of them appearing to be higher in command than the others, ordered the captain of the said sloop to go near to the ship, with which order he complied, and soon anchored astern of the said ship; that in the mean time the officers asked the said master of the sloop several questions, particularly as to whether he had any passengers on board; and when answering to this question in the affirmative, was told by them that they came on purpose to look for the late French minister, Mr. Fauchet, whom they knew to be on board with despatches. That the master and passengers then informed them that Mr. Fauchet had left the sloop in the morning at Stonington, where he had been detained two days by contrary winds, and that he had also that morning left Stonington aforesaid, on horseback, with his despatches and public papers, which were all taken out of paste bound boxes; as proof of the last assertion showing the said boxes empty, five in number; that Mr. Fauchet had really left the sloop, and had gone on overland as aforesaid; that the officers aforesaid, not satisfied with the answers given, said their orders were positive, and directed them to search all the trunks of the passengers, at which proceeding they hoped to see on board would be hurt, as their duty required the same; that they accordingly had all the trunks and boxes in the cabin opened, and, not finding any papers, then went into the hold, where, having ordered Mr. Fauchet's servant to open the trunks of his master, they had them emptied in presence of all the passengers, and out of one of the trunks they took a bundle of papers, which they gave to one of the officers in care, whilst the search went on for the other trunks; which they asked for two other trunks of Mr. Fauchet's, saying they had notice of four trunks shipped on board said sloop, and seeing several other trunks stowed about, they, the said officers, demanded the owners; that one of them belonged to Captain Chahert aforesaid, a gentleman engaged in commercial and seafaring business, was overhauled, and the papers, consisting chiefly of sea books or journals, examined and put aside, with a tin box containing some papers, with letters directed to different persons in France; that they then fell upon the trunk of Mr. Pichon, which, as they found heavy, they desired to have opened, the lieutenant as no one stopped forward with the key, to break the lock thereof; that Mr. Pichon then came forward, and opened the trunk which proved to be full of written papers, under clothes; these throwing out, they observed that it was the trunk of Mr. Fauchet's secretary, and that it contained such a quantity of papers was a sufficient reason for taking it on board the ship, for the inspection of the captain of the ship; that an officer then went on board the ship with such papers as he thought proper to show him, by which he might receive the directions of the commanding officer relative thereto, and relative to further proceedings; that this officer soon returned, and permitted the sloop to depart, saying that the main object being missed, no further detention was necessary, and returning the papers which he had taken on board the sloop; and that the two boats having left the sloop, after a detention of two hours, she came to sail, and arrived at Newport in the evening.

Copy of the letter from the Vice Consul of the French republic at Newport to the Governor of Rhode Island.

NEWPORT, RHODE ISLAND, 16th Thermidor.

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:—
A multiplicity of business has prevented me from paying you my respects, and obliged me to present them to you by letter. I am sensibly affected, in commencing my official correspondence with your excellency on an affair of a disagreeable nature, which obliges me to claim immediately the protection of the United States in the following case.

I have the honor to lay before you the affidavit of Thomas Bliss, captain of the Peggy, on her way from New York to Newport, on board of which citizen Fauchet, minister of the French republic, was passenger. You will observe that this packet was arrested very near the land, in the waters of the United States, obliged by force of arms to come to Newport, which was attended and afterwards detained with an indecency carried so far as not to allow a coat of the minister to be exempt from the basest researches; and he probably owes his personal escape to the precaution he took of landing at Stonington.

The law of nations, the reciprocal respect of the two Governments, the sacred rights of territory and hospitality, have been violated in the most flagrant manner.

Permit me to address myself to your excellency, and to request you to take such measures as your justice and prudence shall dictate, for represening such odious infractions of the laws of nations, and to prevent the functionaries of a republic in friendship with the United States from being exposed to such humiliating insults.

I am, with respect, &c.

Joseph Fauchet to Citizen Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States.

NEWPORT, 17th Thermidor, 3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Citizen:

The vice consul at Newport transmits to you the affidavit of the passengers who were on board the packet boat Peggy, of Newport, which was stopped and examined by the English ship Africa, at the entrance of this port, and within two miles of the land. I do not make any reflection on this insult, which at once violates the law of nations and the neutrality of the United States. The facts themselves are sufficient to lead to a presumptive belief of your zeal will be rewarded on this occasion, which will appear unheard of by only those who are unacquainted with the history of the English. I shall express to you but one affecting sentiment, which is, that, in a free State, with a Government in which England has just acquired a friend, there is no safety for myself or my papers; for, in a war, the English have already proved in a neutral port, that I was to have been carried off, there is no reason why I should not be taken on the high way, or in an inn, if it could be done with impunity. Well thinking American will not grieve, my friend, at hearing that it was on the spot where French blood, for the first time, was shed for American independence, that the attempt was made to destroy my papers. As you have any details you will find them in a letter written to me by citizen Pichon, whom I had left on board the packet boat to inform me of events.

Receive the assurance, &c.

JH. FAUCHET.

P. S. The Africa has just anchored at Canonniucut ferry; she was driven in by stress of weather. Her late conduct gives her a great claim to the enjoyment of the most sacred hospitality of the Americans.

No. 155.

Mr. Pichon to Mr. Fauchet.

NEWPORT, 15th Thermidor, (2d August, 1795), 3d year of the French republic.

Citizen:

I cannot but felicitate you on the resolution you took yesterday, of setting off with your papers, from Stoning- ton, for this city, by land. The information you had received of the design formed by the English for intercepting the sloops on board of which you had embarked, and seizing you and your papers, is verified, I acknowledge, in a manner calculated to render me less confident in the apparent safety of our passage, and I have reason to repent not having followed you with citizen Bouronneville. This disaster, however, has happily cost me but a few moments of disquietude, and, moreover, given me an opportunity of seeing the proceedings of the English on this occasion, in all their magnificence, and the motives to their operation.

You have, doubtless, already heard, by public report, of the arrestation of the sloop Peggy, by the English ship Africa, in sight of the port of Newport. Immediately on my arrival in this city, I had the proper steps taken for obtaining, before a proper officer, the declaration of Captain Bliss, and of the passengers whom I could collect. I found I had been anticipated in this by Mr. Martin, commandant of the militia of this county. This officer had already taken measures for the same object, with the view of directly informing the General Government of what had taken place, according to the circular orders expedited by the President of the United States to the Executives of the different States. I thought it my duty, however, to take a copy of Captain Bliss's and the passengers' deposition, certified by a notary public, among the number of whom you will find my signature. I have the honor to send you this copy, which I took expressly to transmit to you.

The principal facts are established completely in the affidavit. I am sorry the dispersion of the passengers, who are already either scattered through the city, or set out for Providence and Boston, did not allow a greater number of signatures. However, the authenticity of the deposition will probably not be contested: if it should, the rest of the passengers, who are all citizens of Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, might still be called upon as evidence.

On my part, I have nothing very particular to add to this paper; I have, however, pursuant to your orders, carefully observed every thing that passed on this occasion, I shall report some circumstances which may be more particularly interesting to you.

The Africa's boats had some arms. The officers had their swords, and one or two pairs of pistols in the stern of each boat. This circumstance, added to the firing of a cannon at us, loaded with ball, and to our being observed, when near the vessel, several pieces pointed, sufficiently show the intention of the commander, if we had endeavored to avoid him, or to gain the land.

When the search in the cabin was finished, they went to the hold. They desired the captain to point out our effects. He answered that he did not know the passengers' baggage. I then advised your servant to deny his having the keys, in case they should ask him for them. However, on hearing the officers who commanded the party say that they would break open your trunks, and reflecting that resistance would only augment suspicion, I desired him to go down and open them. The two of which he had the keys were examined with the exactness of an excise officer endeavoring to discover contraband goods. The whole was overturned and ransacked. During this operation, it was mentioned that the papers were all they wanted, and, in a low tone of voice, they felicitated themselves at having found them. They took, from one of the trunks, a bundle of papers, which I supposed to be letters for individuals. These papers, finding nothing more, infirmared for two other trunks, observing it was known that Mr. Fauchet had embarked four trunks at New York. In the search for them, they met with a trunk belonging to citizen Chabert. They found his papers relative to his commanding the Argonaut, belonging to the India company, and also the ship called the Citizen of Marseilles. His journals, his charts, some signals, papers concerning his affairs, letters addressed to divers persons in France, all these appeared important to the officers, who judged in the gross, from the appearances, ignorant of the French language; the whole was thrown into a handkerchief, and set apart. They then came to my largest trunk. I had, hitherto, remained unknown. The owner was asked for. I kept a distance, until finding that they were going to break it open. I went down with the key, I supposed, into the trunk to prevent it. They took every bundle of papers, overturned the whole, without, however, being able to read any. I observed to these gentlemen, that, their avowed object being to seize dispatches, they should not so freely overturn papers which were neither sealed nor covered. They replied by several observations more or less reasonable, which showed that their ignorance of the French language was absolute, and ended their search with the remark, that such was the fortune of war. As you will observe in the affidavit how the scene terminated, I omit repeating it here.

I had decided to follow my papers on board the Africa, if they had taken them there, in order to assist so insolent an inspection. The only fear I had was that of being driven off, but I was not detected. I observed every precaution, which the search ended, that they were ashamed for having been so minute in it when they found that you had gone off with your papers.

I take the liberty to finish this letter by observing to you, that the English consul dined, on that day, on board the Africa, and was there during the detention of the packet boat. This circumstance characterizes the infraction of which you were to have been the victim; it bespeaks the intervention of a superior authority, who would in vain mask himself under the ignorance of the public law among seafaring people, or, under the cloak of a mere feigned indignation. It is said that the English consul will explain this intervention fully.

Salut and fraternity.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 3d Protector, (18th August, 1795, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: I informed you by my letter of the 10th August, (old style) of the insult committed by the English ship of war Africa on the neutrality of the United States and the law of nations. I requested from you a reparation proportioned to the outrage committed towards the republic of France on the person of my predecessor. I requested it in the name of justice, in the name of the friendship which unites our two countries; I had every reason to expect it. From what fatality it is, sir, that the captain of the Africa, whose injurious proceedings are known, still finds an asylum in the ports of the United States: insults by his menaces the authority of your country; and dares to claim the same advantages enjoyed by the French frigate Medusa at Newport, and preserves his station in the middle of the entrance of that port? He will, without doubt, not quit this station unless it be to pursue the frigate Medusa, notwithstanding the law of nations, and the proclamation of the President of the United States, which prohibit all vessels of war from going out of the ports of the United States, or from using them as a station in order to cruise against enemy vessels. Can the same design be imputed to the Africa, and are not the friendship which the United States bear to France, the respect due to their neutrality, the honor of their Government and their laws, equally interested in preventing the Africa from consummating the new attempt which she meditates, if not arrested, in your ports? Should she not be ordered to quit them? If not, of what value are the friendship and treaties which connect the people? What would you wish the French republic to think of the intentions of the Government of the United States, when, on the one hand, an English vessel exercising an open robbery in the waters of your States, enjoys an asylum, an hospitality, due only to friends? And, on the other, a French ship of war comes into your ports under the guarantee of the law of nations, of your neutrality, and of your treaties, is arrested and seized in contempt of these same treaties, when the law of nations, the honor of the United States, are unattended to by the English who insult them; and when our treaties are violated, for the purpose of satisfying the indiscriminate demand of a single individual.

That the new treaty connecting the United States with England cannot weaken ours, you have assured me, sir; you have told me that the intentions of the President were firm in this respect, and I have never doubted it. That treaty, you have always affirmed, cannot destroy the good dispositions of the American Government towards France: Are those dispositions and your promises ineffectual? I cannot believe it. I rather flatter myself that the present circumstances will convince me that I am not deceived, and that the republic will have a positive proof of that friendship of which it has so often received assurances. In this persuasion, I flatter myself that you will take the necessary measures in order to prevent the Africa from using your ports as a station whence to cruise on the French frigate Medusa. Referring, moreover, to my letters of the 9th, 11th, and 18th August (old style) I reiterate to you my application as to the corvette le Cassius, arrested in your ports in violation of our treaties, and I notify you that, if I do not speedily obtain justice, I shall abandon this vessel to the American Government, to its risk, reserving the right to future claim, and I shall refer the matter to my Government.

Accept, sir, &c.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of War, charged with the Department of State, to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, September 5, 1795.

Sir: On the 25th ultimo I had the honor to inform you (in answer to your letter of the 19th) that the violation of the laws of nations by the British ship of war Africa, in the instance to which you referred, had engaged the attention of the Government of the United States; at the same time mentioning some circumstances which might have caused delays.

To maintain the character of fairness and impartiality with which the President desired that all the acts of his administration might be marked, he was willing to allow full time for any representations and explanations which Captain Home, the commander of the Africa, might think proper to make; that time has elapsed, and none have been received. On the contrary, some recent acts show that he has repeated his aggressions. The President has, therefore, now determined to pursue such measures as are in his power to vindicate the sovereignty and rights of the United States. And as a principal aggression was committed by Captain Home, in the attempt made to take your predecessor, Mr. Fauchet, and his papers, it is just that you should receive the information I am going to communicate.

Governor Fenner is desired to transmit to Captain Home the demand of the President of the United States, that he immediately remove from a station within their jurisdiction, where he has violated, and continues to violate, their rights. The Governor is also desired to make known to Captain Home that, after forty-eight hours from the time this requisition shall be communicated to him, all intercourse between the citizens of the United States and the ship under his command will be forbidden.

Further, a full statement of the conduct of that officer will be transmitted to the minister of the United States at London, to be laid before the British Government for the purpose of obtaining reparation.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Mr. Pickering to the Governor of Rhode Island.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, September 5, 1795.

Sir: The President of the United States, ever desirous of manifesting the fairness and impartiality of his administration, was not in haste to decide upon the conduct of Captain Rodham Home, commander of the British ship of war Africa, for his violation of the sovereignty of the United States, as represented in the protest of Thomas Bliss, master of the sloop Peggy, sailing within the jurisdiction and under the flag of the United States; and for the menace and insulting demands in his letter of the 31st of July, addressed to Thomas William Moore, Esq. His Britannic Majesty's vice consul in Rhode Island, and by him communicated to your excellency. Representations on this subject were made to His Britannic Majesty's minister, and since his departure, to his chargé des affaires, with an intimation of the President's intention to wait a reasonable time for the counter representation of Captain Home, and such explanations from him and Mr. Moore as they should think proper to offer. That time has elapsed, and no satisfactory explanations have been given; on the contrary, it appears that Captain Home is continuing his aggressions. The President has therefore decided on the measures which his duty requires him to take, to vindicate the sovereignty and rights of the United States. In pursuance of this determination, I am now to desire your excellency to communicate to the Governor of the State of Rhode Island a letter, dated the 31st of July, addressed to you by Captain Rodham Home, commander of the British ship of war Africa, the contents whereof you saw were highly indecent and unjustifiable: as unrestrained by the respect you owed the Government by whose permission you exercised your office, you have thus co-operated with Captain Home to the great injury of His Britannic Majesty, and enforced the President's judgment to be longer proper that you should be permitted to exercise the functions or powers of a vice consul within the United States. You will, therefore, receive enclosed a copy of the letters patent which have been issued for the revoking the exequatur, heretofore granted to you, and which will be made public.

I am, &c.

No. 160.

GEORGE WASHINGTON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

To all whom it may concern.

Thomas William Moore, Esquire, having heretofore produced to me his commission as vice consul of His Britannic Majesty, within the State of Rhode Island, and having thereon received from me an exequatur, bearing date the 5th day of December, 1793, recognizing him as such, and declaring him free to exercise, within the said State, such functions and powers as may be given or permitted, by the laws of the land, to the consuls of nations, between whom and the United States no treaty or convention exists for permitting specific powers and functions to be exercised by their consuls reciprocally: And the said Thomas William Moore having, on the second day of August, 1795, transmitted to the Governor of the State of Rhode Island a letter, dated the 31st of July, 1795, addressed to him, the said Thomas William Moore, and written by Captain Rodham Home, commander of the British ship of war Africa, and then lying at or near the port of Newport, in said State; which said letter is conceived in terms of menace and insult against the authority of the United States: And the said Thomas William Moore having participated in the commission of the said menace and insult, by transmitting the letter as aforesaid, and having perfect knowledge of its contents: And it being no longer proper, and consistent with the laws of the land, due to the President, by and according to the authority of the United States, that the said Thomas William Moore should continue to exercise any of the functions or powers heretofore allowed, in virtue of his said commission as vice consul: These are, therefore, to declare, that I do no longer recognize the said Thomas William Moore as vice consul of His Britannic Majesty in any part of those United States, nor permit him to exercise any of the functions or powers heretofore granted; and I do hereby wholly revoke the said exequatur heretofore given, and do declare the same to be absolutely void from this day forward.

In testimony whereof, I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the United States of America to be hereunto affixed. Done at the city of Philadelphia, the fifth day of September, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, and of the independence of the United States of America the twentieth.

By the President's command:

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

No. 161.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, September 14, 1795.

Sir: Before this letter reaches you, unofficial information will probably get to hand of the outrage committed by the British man of war the Africa, commanded by Captain Rodham Home, in his attempt to take Mr. Fauchet and his papers, on his passage from New York down the sound to Newport, where he was to embark for France in the frigate Medusa. The station taken by the Africa, in the waters of the State of Rhode Island, seems to have suggested to the people at Newport the idea that she intended to intercept Mr. Fauchet. An express was, therefore, sent to Stonington in Connecticut, where the sloop, in which Mr. Fauchet had embarked, was detained by contrary winds, to warn him of his danger. He then quitted the sloop, and taking his valuable papers with him, pursued his journey by land.

Captain Home made the expected attempt. The sloop was brought to, and two officers of the Africa went on board to search for Mr. Fauchet, or his papers, or both—Captain Home, it seems, said the object was to take his papers only; and, accordingly, finding that those of value had been landed with Mr. Fauchet, the rest were returned unopened. The particulars of this action are stated in the deposition of Thomas Bliss, the master of the packet in which Mr. Fauchet had embarked, of which a copy is enclosed. You will also find enclosed the copy of an insinuating letter from Captain Home for the Governor of Rhode Island, to be conveyed through the British vice

Dr. Francis, Mr. Moore, who was so indiscriminate, and so little respected the dignity of our Government, as to send the Governor a copy of it.

The evidences of the outrage and insulting conduct of Captain Home, with the cooperation of Mr. Moore, were communicated to the British minister and chargé des affaires, and the expectations of Government of repairation announced. For this purpose, and to give opportunity for counter-representations and explanations, time was necessary. Thereupon a letter was given: for justice as well as prudence required an observation of the maxim, "Audire alteram partem."

After a reasonable time had elapsed, and no satisfactory explanations or counter proofs being offered, the President decided that the matter must be taken. These you will find in the before-mentioned letter to Governor Fenner. Besides which, the minister of the United States in London is charged "fully to represent these outrages of Captain Home, and to press for such repairation as the nature of the case authorizes the President to demand. What this should be, it was not necessary to specify. The President relies that His Britannic Majesty will duly estimate the injuries and insults proved to have been committed by Captain Home against the United States, and inflict upon him exemplary punishment as his aggravated offenses deserve; as the violated rights of a sovereign State require: and as it will become the justice and honor of His Majesty's Government to impose." The letter before-mentioned to Governor Fenner was sent from Philadelphia, by the post, on Saturday the 5th instant, when it bears date. On the Monday following, intelligence was received that the Medusa had sailed on the 5th, and that the Africa, in two or three hours afterwards, got under way to pursue her. I am particular in stating the days when the President's orders to Governor Fenner were despatched, and when the first information reached Philadelphia that the Medusa had sailed, because it is not improbable that the suspension of those orders may be represented as calculated to be ineffectual; and it may be suggested that they were not issued finally until it was known that the Africa had left the waters of Rhode Island. But the facts are as I have stated them; and the true and only causes of the suspension are those which I have mentioned, and which you will see in the letter to Governor Moos. The circumstances, in respect to wind and weather, under which the Medusa sailed, joined with her swift sailing, enabled her to escape from the Africa, which has since returned to her former station at Rhode Island. The President's orders, prohibiting all intercourse with her, will now come into operation; and for her additional violation of the rights of a neutral nation, in immediately pursuing the Medusa, a new demand of satisfaction will be made on the British Government. A naval force to compel a due respect to our rights on the water you know we do not possess.

I have the pleasure to inform you that peace with all the Indians on our frontiers is at length accomplished. Georgia and the Southwestern territory have, for some months past, enjoyed tranquillity; and the most prejudiced against the Creeks believe their pacification sincere. On the third of August, General Wayne concluded a treaty with all the Western Indians. This fact is declared in a letter of that date from the Quartermaster General at head quarters, to his deputy, Major Craig, at Pittsburgh. So I rely upon it. I suppose General Wayne must have sent off the official account with the treaty by one of his aids, whose arrival I daily expect. The Island has been taken of Presqu' Isle, where some works are now erecting, for the protection of the inhabitants, and the security of the garrison.

But for the vexations on our commerce by the belligerent Powers, (for they are not confined to the British) we should enjoy perfect repose, amidst unexampled prosperity.

I am, very respectfully, sir, &c.

AFRICA, OFF RHODE ISLAND, July 31, 1795.

Sir: I did expect to have the pleasure of seeing you on board the Africa, but as that is not the case, I am obliged to send an officer to you, under the present circumstances, and to desire that you will lay my letter before the Governor, or other chief magistrate of this island, which is to contain these several requests.

First, that they may be delivered up to me, immediately, an officer who was taken out of a British ship, while in Newport, and confined on board the French frigate now in Rhode Island; this violent proceeding being contrary to the law of all nations in a neutral port. In the second place, that you may receive the aid of the civil power in this Island, to send on board the Africa all British seamen, and others, who have been captured in any vessels, and set at liberty in these States; not a leagued and pretended aid, but such as our nation have a right to expect from the United States, with whom we are at peace and amity. And, thirdly, that I may be permitted to buy such refreshments as my ship's company are in need of; and that, in case I send my own boats on shore, my people and officers shall not be liable to insult from any of the inhabitants, or other, of whatever description, and to represent a copy of it to the Governor; that my officers, who carries this, or any other officer who I have mentioned, guilty of such a breach of neutrality, I will then look upon myself, in the same manner, as not bound to observe the neutrality of these parts; and that I am resolved to be treated in the same manner, in all respects whatever, as they do those of the French republic; and I am more plain in the nature of my present demands, as I have received a hint, that, if I send my people on shore, they will be considered as such; and in this case I want to spy nothing. I am in full possession of every intelligence, regarding that ship, which I want to be possessed of. And I require a written answer from the Governor of Rhode Island to these demands, and that without loss of time.

I am, sir, &c.

RODHAM HOME.

To Thomas Wm. Moore, Esq.
His Brit. Maj. Vice Consul, Rhode Island.

State of Rhode Island, &c.

The preceding contains a true copy of an original letter from Thomas Wm. Moore, and of a copy of Rodham Home's letter to him accompanying it, duly compared.

Witness,

HENRY WARD, Secretary.
You have been nominated as the successor of Mr. Gouverneur Morris, in the office of minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the republic of France, from a confidence that, while you keep steadily in view the necessity of rendering yourself acceptable to that Government, you will maintain the self respect due to our own. In doing the one and the other of your prudence and understanding must be the guides after first possessing a just and real sentiment of the unalterable connection of your nation.

The President has been an early and decided friend of the French Revolution; and whatever reason there may have been, under our ignorance of facts and policy, to suspend an opinion upon some of its important transactions, you will find it to be the wish of the French Republic to be made acquainted with the leading events in your country, to be made acquainted with the leading events in your country, and to be guided by every opportunity to the best and most just plans. Notwithstanding the accidental appearance of any new order of things to this day, and the fluctuation and mutual destruction of parties, forbid a minister of a foreign country to attach himself to any as such, and dictate to him not to incline to any set of men, further than they appear to go with the sense of the nation.

When the executive provisional council recalled Mr. Genet, they expressed a determination to render it a matter of eclat, as you have seen, and at the same time disavowed all his offensive acts. Nothing having been forwarded to us, relative to Mr. Morris, which requires a disavowal, you will, if you should be interrogated as to any particular feeling of the president or provisional council, or any impression from the Secretary of State to Mr. Fauchet, as explainatory of the President's promptness to comply with their demand.

From Mr. Genet and Fauchet we have uniformly learned, that France did not desire us to depart from neutrality; and it would have been unwise to have asked us to do otherwise: for our ports are open to her prizes, while they are shut to the other nations. Great Britain and Spain, as great powers in commerce, were at war, as they can even now, notwithstanding the British instructions; and as they may be, if the demands to be made upon Great Britain should succeed. We have, therefore, pursued neutrality with faithfulness; we have paid it dear. It did not, therefore, to us, that the minister has asserted his country should have been paid more, if the state of our affairs did not require us to be prepared with funds for the payment of our foreign war. It is equally true, to what we have called a moderate course of conduct in future; and to remove all jealousy with respect to Mr. Jay's mission to London, you may say, that he is positively forbidden to weaken the engagements between this country and France. It is not in his power to be the single judge of this head, suspicions of various kinds. But you may declare the motives of that mission to be, to obtain immediate compensation for our plundered property, and restitution of the posts. You may intimate, by way of argument, but without ascribing it to the Government, that, if war should be necessary, the effects of the people of the United States towards it, would be better secured by a manifestation that everything should be taken to avoid it and that the British nation would be divided, when they found that we had been forced into it. This may be briefly touched upon as the path of prudence with respect to ourselves; and also with respect to France, since we are unable to give her aids of men or money. To this matter you cannot be too advertent. It is a subject of public repulsion with us, as it is a public impeachment of the most distant intention to sacrifice our connection with France to any other union with England. The approbation or the censure of the President to have it signified abroad that he is averse to admit into his public room, which is free to tall the world besides, any Frenchmen who are obnoxious to the French republic; although, perhaps, it may again happen sometimes, as many go thither, whose name is unknown.

It is very probable that our country will become the asylum for most of the French who expatriate themselves from their native land. Our laws have never yet made a distinction of persons, nor is such a distinction very easy. Hence some of those who are perhaps attainted in France, have thrown themselves upon the protection of the United States. It must be, at any rate, to them, a matter of concurrence to be misinterpreted into any estrangement from the French cause. You will explain this, whenever it shall be necessary.

If we judge from what has been at different times uttered by Mr. Fauchet, he will represent the existence of truths that are so clear and undeniable, that it is a matter of contempt to each other. One republican, and friendly to the French revolution; the other, monarchical, aristocratic, Britannic, and anti-Gallican: that a majority of the House of Representatives, the people, and the President, are in the first class; and a majority of the Senate in the second. If this intelligence should be used, in order to inspire a distrust of our good will to France, you will industriously obviate such an effect: and if a false and public representation should, in any manner, be made, that what is desired by France, will be by a plain and candid application to the Government, and not by those insidious operations, which will keep the people, which Genet endeavored to carry on.

We will communicate to you the information which we possess of France, before and in the early stages of the Revolution, must be consideribly changed at this day. You will, therefore, transmit to us, as soon as possible, an account of the navy, the agriculture, and the commerce of France. It is desirable, too, to know upon what footing religion really stands. These, however, are general objects. But we are particularly concerned to understand the true state of the different sects of politicians. Are there any of the old friends to the ancient régime remaining? Are any new friends created by the course of things? Are the Bissontines extinguished? Are the Dantonists overwhelmed? Is Robespierre's party firmly fixed? Is he capable, from talents and personal fortitude, to direct the storm? Is his character free from imputation, as to money? Is he friendly to the United States? How is the executive power administered now? What is the authority of the other branches? How is it ascertained and sanctioned by them? We have had twelve commissions of administration, which have been lately established, bear to that committees? What is the true cause of the various changes, which have lately taken place, by one party rising upon the ruins of another? What alteration is to be in the state, the relations of things, so long maintaining the same, not knowing what is the issue?

For without doubting the solidity of the French cause, we ought not to be unprepared for any event. If, therefore, any very momentous turn should arise in French affairs, upon which the conduct of our Government may depend, you need not hesitate at the expense of an advice boat, if to no other satisfactory object. But it must be in the name of the United States; and it must be done for purposes of the public safety, and the preservation of the transactions of it, and embrace every proper conveyance, by duplicates, and, in great cases, even by triplicates.

Should you be interrogated about the treaty of commerce, you may reply that it has never been proposed to us by Mr. Jay. To all other things else concerning it, you will express yourself not to be instructed, and under a subject to be negotiated with the Government here.

In like manner, if a treaty of alliance, or if the execution of the guarantee of the French Islands, by force of arms, should be proposed, you will refer the republic of France to this side of the water. In short, you are expected, with a care reverence on your discretion, that you will not commit the United States, by any specific declaration, except where you are particularly instructed, and except too in giving testimony of our attachment to their cause.

There is reason to believe that the embargo, when it was first laid, excited some uneasy sensations in the breast of the French minister. For it so happened that, at the moment before its operation, pretty considerable shipments of flour were made to the British West Indies, and a snow, called La Camille, laden with flour, for France, was arrested near Newcastle, on the Delaware, after she had quitted the port of Philadelphia. But you know enough of the history of this business to declare that the embargo was leveled against Great Britain, and was made general merely because, if it had been partial against her, it would have amounted to a cause of war and, also, that it was not continued for any other cause than to be injurious to France. My letters to Mr. Fauchet will explain the case of La Camille, and all his complaints about the embargo.

Should our embargo be brought up, the way will be easy for our complaint against the embargo of Bordeaux. At any rate, you will reprove against it, and urge satisfaction for the sufferers. You will receive all the papers which have come into the Department of State relative to those matters; and you will, besides, open a correspondence with the captains and persons interested at Bordeaux, in order to obtain more accurate information.

But you will go farther, and insist upon compensation for the captures and spoliations of our property, and injuries to our persons and districts, by French cruisers. Mr. Fauchet has been applied to, and promises to co-operate for the obtaining of satisfaction.

The dilatoriness with which business is transacted in France will, if not curtailed in the adjustment of these cases, produce influences toward our Ministers which must be firmly repulsed by the French Republic; and you may be sure that the intimation of how unfortunate it would be if so respectable a body as the British merchants should relax in their zeal for the French cause, from irritation at their losses. The papers on this head are a statement of French cases, Mr. Fauchet's letters to me, and the documents themselves.

We know the extreme distress in which the inhabitants of St. Domingo came either, after the disasters of the Cape. Private charity, and especially at Baltimore, most liberally contributed to their support. The Congress at length advanced fifteen thousand dollars, with a view of reimbursement from France. This subject has been broken to Mr. Fauchet here, and he appears to have been roused at the idea of supporting, by French money, French aristocrats and democrats indiscriminately. Both he and his nation ought to be satisfied that, in cause of humanity, oppressed by poverty, political opinions have nothing to do. Add to this, that none but the really indigent receive a farthing. It was the duty of the French republic to relieve their colonists laboring under a penury so produced; and it would have been a far more salutary plan than the wholesale distribution of money; and will not be deemed an offensive disposal of French money that we now make a claim for repayment. If Mr. Fauchet has heard of a subject upon the other, an attempt will be made for a settlement with him here; but that being very doubtful, it will forward the retribution by discussing it in Europe.

The paper charged with the squandering of several American citizens for bills of exchange drawn in the French West Indies on France. The report of a committee of them, Mr. Fauchet's letter, and the vouchers, which you will carry, leave no doubt of your success. But if there should be any difficulty, do not fail to communicate it to the Secretary of State instantaneously. You have, therefore, the affair is entered upon, the better.

It is important that no public character of the United States should be in France under any imputation. You will inquire into the consuls, and inform how they are approved, and whether they are deserving. Although the President will avoid, as much as possible to appoint any obnoxious person, consul, it may happen otherwise, and must be considered as accidental. Mr. Alexander Duvernay goes for Paris in the quality of vice consul, and Mr. Fauchet said that he had nothing to object to him.

Consulates are established in every port of France where they are conceived useful. But perhaps you may find it advisable to mark out some other places for such offices.

It is recommended that no business of consequence be carried on verbally, or in writing, but in your own language.

The minister of each nation has a right to use his national tongue, and few men can confide in their exactness when they do business in a foreign one. But great care is necessary in the choice of interpreters when they are to be resorted to.

It is a practice of great utility to note down every conversation of consequence which you hold, immediately after retirement; and the Executive will expect to receive copies of what shall be thus written.

A communication with our other ministers in Europe, under proper caution, may be advantageous.

Let nothing depend upon verbal communication which can be carried on in writing.

To conclude. You go, sir, to France, to strengthen our friendship with that country; and you are well acquainted with the line of freedom and ease to which you may advance without betraying the dignity of the United States. You will, by the present and subsequent betraying the hands of France, the most indigent citizens; the heavy tax which these unhappy fugitives have been upon us, and the impossibility of seeing them starve in our country, no other operation than to narrow his objection to the disbursements of the Congress, as well as denouncing the policy which we are adopting, in order to bring this article immediately into view; and as it is short in principle so will it be sufficient for us to obtain a short decree, that such parts of the fifteen thousand dollars as may have been expended upon the succor of the indigent inhabitants of St. Domingo, who took refuge here after the disasters of the Cape, be credited to the United States in the account of France with the French government.

We have heard, with regret, that several of our citizens have been thrown into prison in France, from a suspicion of criminal attacks against the Government. If they are guilty, we are extremely sorry for it; for innocent. The President, the Congress, and every friend of the United States, without delay, collect information of every American citizen under confinement, and of his case; and whatsoever ought aw to be promptly and decisively; taking care to see that your path is clear, and affording no pretext for being charged with demands against the law of nations. Among these persons are Archibald Hunter, and Shubael Allen; concerning the former, I am under the impression that he relates are serious and important, and it is wished you lose no time in having all things rectified and compensated, as to past instances, and to prevent a repetition of future.

The enclosed letter, from one Binard, of Brest, speaks of his having been appointed vice consul of the United States there, by Mr. Barrall Carnes, our late consul at Nantes. In this he is mistaken, as Mr. Carnes had no right... to appoint a vice consul under himself, and probably went no further than to constitute him an agent, as consuls may lawfully do. Mr. Dobrae, having succeeded Mr. Carnes, will probably take similar measures with respect to an agent; but it is desirable that you should immediately examine this matter well, and cause to be done what shall appear necessary to effectual redress.

If a vice consul should appear to be really necessary, you will inform me by the first opportunity.

Mr. G. Morris having recommended Mr. Francis Coffyn to be our consul at Dunkirk, a temporary commission is sent to him, and will be submitted to the Senate for renewal unless, from a view of all circumstances relative to his situation, (he being understood to be in some case or other) you should think it improper that he should be employed in the service of the United States.

Mr. G. Morris will have probably communicated to you the steps which he has lately taken to accomplish a peace with Algiers, and the liberation of our fellow citizens in captivity. But, lest he may have accidentally omitted to communicate a letter of intention to a certain candidate for one of the other foreign powers upon this head, and is not minute in that letter, as to the instructions which he has given, we are left to conjecture what course has been pursued. You will, therefore, inform the proper authority that the President, with the approbation of the Senate and House of Representatives, will be disposed to at least a renewal of the treaty between the United States and Algiers; not doubting, at the same time, that it must prove beneficial to the supplies of France from hence; that the powers derived from Mr. Morris to the agent who was to accompany, on our part, the French commissioner, though they are, as yet, unknown to us, have, no doubt, been judicious, and the acts, in conformity with those powers, will be found to aim strongly at the benefit of the United States; and that these powers will be of a long duration, having been committed to this business, possesses a full knowledge of our views and our means, and has been particularly visitor in our attempts for peace with Algiers; that he will, if he should think it necessary, instruct the agent appointed by Mr. Morris to that effect the auspices of the French republic will be continued to the efforts under the guidance of Colonel Humphreys; and that, as an evidence of our confidence in the French Government, you are empowered, if you conceive it to be advisable, to impart the terms upon which we expect to buy peace; but the circumstances and consequences of such communication are to be well weighed before it be made.

The cases of spoliation and vexation from the French cruisers on our trade, I again most earnestly recommend to your anxious attention. Mr. Fauchet has promised to forward a recommendation of them to his Government. You will do well to press the principle without delay; and if doubts are entertained as to facts, put the subjects into a true light by early decision, especially since French policy will surely inflict them upon their citizens; and that we have greatly suffered by their plunderings, the papers accompanying this letter, if they be true, manifest. We are no less disturbed at the conduct concerning the embargo at Brest. If the account brought has been truly, by one of the captains who were detained, he gives the principle of compensation being due to us only. You are, therefore, again charged to make this also your special and immediate business; and to press the rights of our citizens in a manner which indicates that we cannot waive the justice due to us. In short, sir, it is the express instruction of the President that you diligently inquire into every inconvenience to which our trade has been subjected, and to penetrate strongly upon them, and to represent to the facts to us fully and minutely. Had not Mr. Morris so strenuously pressed the affair of the ship Laurens of Charleston, which is committed to your care, I would here repeat all the circumstances. But these may be obtained as well from Mr. Morris as from the French archives. The decrees upon which the conduct of the French republic was founded, in this case, which I note particularly, on account of these decrees, have also been denounced against by Mr. Morris; and I question whether much matter can be added to his observations. But such of these decrees as tend to the condemnation of the Laurens are gross violations of our rights. You, no doubt, will have resumed this subject immediately on your arrival, and you will have the pleasure of being able to report to him, and to me, that this day to weaken the friendship between the two countries. As you carried with you a statement from this Department relative to the spoliations of our trade, and copies of Mr. Fauchet's letters respecting them, I do not repeat here. But these will assist you in the demands which you are to make on the French Government.

I am, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

Paris, November 11, 1794.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Sir: On the 31st ultimo I arrived at Havre, and, on the 2d instant, at this place. Mr. Morris was, upon my arrival, from town, but he came in as soon as advised of it. By him I was presented to the commissary of foreign affairs, who assured me that, as soon as the form of my reception should be settled, he would apprise me of it, but that he had not as yet been called from the latter; that as a consequence of this, Mr. Morris had given me his account of the late convention of Robespierre, as from the necessity of making some general regulation in that respect, it being the first instance in which a minister had been addressed to the republic. I assured him I should want no pleasure, and that I was eager to speak to him, and desire him, by this means, to strengthen the friendship between the two countries. As you carried with you a statement from this Department relative to the spoliations of our trade, and copies of Mr. Fauchet's letters respecting them, I do not repeat here. But these will assist you in the demands which you are to make on the French Government.

I am, &c.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

sion are, perhaps, without parallel in the annals of history. It is generally conceded that, for some months before his fall, the list of prisoners was shown him, every evening, by the president of the revolutionary tribunal, and that he marked those who were to be the victims of the succeeding day, which, under the joint influence of sixteen hours of sleep, of a true suspicion, and upon the imputation of conspiracies, &c., but for the sole reason that some members had been more friendly to Brissot, Danton, &c., and had expressed a jealousy of his power. His oppression had, in fact, gained to such a height that a convulsion became every day more and more probable. The Directory acknowledged and feared the danger. Some make him the active party, and believe that he had arranged with the commune and the guards of the city the plan of a general massacre of his enemies in the Convention. But I am of opinion that these projects, for they were certainly contemplated, proceeded from despair, and were adopted at the moment only as the means of rescue, which was therefore the most effectual plan that could be adopted. He had been intimated, some days before, by him or St. Just, that other conspiracies threatened the safety of the republic, and which ought to be laid open. The communication was given in such a manner as to satisfy the audience that it meant Tallien and some other members of the house, in, in, in the expression or the expectation of a denunciation of these members. If the power of Robespierre remained, it was well known that death and denunciation went hand in hand. To repel it by a counter one was the only remaining hope. It could, in no event, produce a worse effect. Tallien, therefore, rose, and in the same tone of invective intimated in his name the agitation of the people, the necessity of popular force, &c., &c. "Tis time to draw the veil from perfidy so flagrant." St. Just was silenced, and driven from the tribune. Robes- pierre ascended, and made many efforts to speak, in vain. The whole Convention rose, and cried out, with one voice, "Down with the tyrant!" He stood like one amazed and stopped, staring at the Convention, which seemed entirely to have been taken aback, and remained silent. Did he think to engage in a contest of oratory? But, instead of his station in the tribune, heretofore the theatre of his power, and began to harangue the people, and he was interrupted. They began to harangue the people, and in the character of general, was busied in assembling the guards in the place before the hall of the Convention, with intention to fire on it. There was, at this moment, an awful pause which seemed to indicate that the people was greatly alarmed. The situation of the Convention was truly interesting. They knew that all the appointments were conferred by Robes- pierre, that he had been long deputed a patriot, and still possessed, by means of affection or terror, a wonderful influence over the citizens at large; and, more immediately in their presence, those who had been, not uniformly, but in many cases, his accomplices. It was an occasion. On the contrary, it displayed a degree of fortitude and magnanimity worthy of those who aspire to the exalted character of defenders of their country. It calmly entered upon the subject of defence; declared Robes- pierre had wasted the public money over the proceedings; had placed the council of the guard, and sent deputies to the sections to admonish them of their danger, and warn them to stand at their posts in defence of their country. A moment's reflection settled the public mind. The people beheld, on the one hand, the Convention laboring to save the republic, and, on the other, Robespierre and his associates in open rebellion against the law. They had formed any plan of permanent establishment for himself, or been permitted, in so many, to be, no person ever raised himself to power, and by his efforts to promote it; but, it is not probable he had such a scheme; and that it was not promised, must be obvious to those who take into view all the circumstances which merit consideration. It will be observed, by those who wish to form a just estimate of the future course and fortune of this revolution, that, from its commencement to the present time, no person ever raised himself to power; by the proof he had furnished of his attachment to the cause, by his efforts to promote it; and, that, from the moment doubts were entertained of the solidity and purity of his principles, it had his influence begin to decline in equal degree. This was seen in the instances of Lariboisiere, &c., whom, though they were admirable generals, were abandoned by the armies they commanded; the former compelled to seek refuge in a foreign country, and the latter in the camp of the enemy; and the others, though eminent in the civil department, were, upon like charges, condemned by the public voice to the same fate that Robespierre. Some people has been observed to say, that Robespierre was too ingenious to Robespierre and his associates were taken at the same time to prison, and, on the next day, to execution, amidst the rejoicing and acclamation of the people.

Many believe that Robespierre aimed at despotic power, and sought to establish himself upon the throne of the Constitution, in the person of protector, or some such character; and, in pursuit of this idea, say, that he counted upon the support of the armies, and particularly the army of the north, and had otherwise arranged things in such order as to favor the project. What his views of ambition and carnage were, I know not; that they had been great was beyond a doubt. I saw the evidence in his former pronouncements, his speech at St. Just, and his upbraiding of the public for not contributing to his support. If he had not propos- it is not probable he had such a scheme; and that it was not promised, must be obvious to those who take into view all the circumstances which merit consideration. triviality, that liberty it has so nobly contended for, or will it not rather turn its victorious arms against the bosom of its country? These great and important questions, and in which my short time and space will not permit me give satisfactory answers. Hereafter I shall be able to give you better information in these respects.

At present I can only observe, that I have neither seen nor heard of any symptom of discontent showing itself among the people at large. The oppression of Robespierre had indeed created an uneasiness, but which disappeared with the man. The people never saw in the countenances of men more apparent content with its condition, or more willing to reap and secure it; but the women, the boys, and the girls, even to tender age, have supplied their places. I saw this with amazement upon my route from Havre to this place, and am told it is generally the case. The victories of the revolutionary armies excited and were celebrated with joy and exultation in all parts of the country. The very sight of the red flag has, in many instances, accompanied, possibly even to the point of witnessing a deputation to the Convention, and often from the poorest citizens, to throw into its coffers some voluntary contribution for the support of the war. These are not symptoms of disgust with the reigning Government, and of a desire to change it.

But with respect to the present disposition of the army, or what it may be at the end of the war, I can say less, as I have not seen it. At present the best understanding subsists between it and the Convention. It is possible, that in the course of service, if the war should last long, many of its members may acquire habits unfriendly to the Republic; but in an army composed of the yeomanry of the country, as this is, that sentiment will be less apt to gain ground, and its influence would not be so destructive as that which has so generally prevailed under the monarchy, and is only to continue to produce some effect, even in its final disposition? If, however, there should still remain a considerable force on foot, which could not be prevailed on to retire; fond of conquest, of rapine, and of plunder; can it be supposed, that its parent country will furnish the only and most grateful theatre to act on? Will no other portion of Europe present it a more productive field, whereon to gratify ambition, avarice, or revenge? There must always remain in the breasts of the soldiers some sentiment in favor of their relatives; and the fortunes of the wealthy will be pretty well broken and dissipated here by the course of the revolution. The example of the Roman emperors, who, after long periods of the most bloody and productive wars, were rewarded with a general action, and in the hope of regaining Charleroy. He attacked them at every point, about five in the morning, formed in the field, and ready to receive him. Three times he drove them back within their entrenchments, reluctant to yield the day: but they rallied out a fourth time, with still greater impetuosity, shouting through all their ranks, "we will retrench no more," and singing theExpose, Deux Mains, and other popular songs, advancing in an order which was irresistible. The attack succeeded. Cobourg, with his routed army, fled before them, leaving on the field, according to the French accounts, about ten thousand slain. The French, it is supposed, lost, about fifteen thousand. They have taken the course of the preceding campaign, and in their ranks, between Mons, Tourcoing, Hazebrouck, Lille, Lens, Hazebrouck, Ghent, Charleroi, Brussels, Ghent, Quaynay, Lille, Nieuport, Caudans, (at the mouth of the Scheldt) with some other places lying in that quarter. Cobourg at present occupies the ground in the neighborhood of Maestricht, and endeavours to cover the frontier of Holland. It is, however, daily expected another action will take place, with the prospect of the fate of Tilly and Contades and Valenciennes, you observe, are left in the rear; they are yet possessed by the combined forces, but are invested, and it is thought will soon fall.

Their success in Spain has likewise been great. They are in possession, at present, of the whole of the province of Guipuscoa, Bilboa excepted. Many prisoners and immense parks of artillery have been taken from the Spaniards; it will give you some idea of the kind of operations, to have such a list.

There has been but one sea action, and which was between the French and English fleets, in the course of the present summer. The French had twenty-six ships, and the English twenty-eight. The English, having the wind, bore down the French, and separated seven ships from them, and took, and the rest of it.

It is said there never was a more bloody, or better fought action on both sides. It lasted three days. On the fourth, the Britts filed off with the ships they had taken, and sailed into port. The French, having offered to re-new the combat, likewise retired afterwards to Brest, whether they conducted the merchantmen from America, and which was the object of the contest, safe.

I shall write you again in a few days, and I hope to inform you of my reception. For the present, therefore, I shall conclude, with assurances of the great respect and esteem with which I am, &c.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.
Parris, Aug. 25, 1794.

Sir: In my last, of the 18th instant, I mentioned to you that I had been presented to the commission of foreign affairs, for reception; and was assured I would lay the copy of my credentials, which I left with him, before the committee of public safety, under whom he acted, and to whom it more particularly belonged to appoint the time and regulate the mode. After this, I waited eight or ten days without progressing an iota; and as I heard that a minister from Paris was expected about that time, I was more anxious than ever to see him; and as my time was so long, and perhaps much longer, in the same situation. It was obvious that the public boards had been so much shocked by the late disaster, that, from a variety of considerations, some public and others private, they could scarcely move forward upon any subject. At the same time, I had reason to believe it was the general wish they should give you every degree of respect for the character I represented. Upon the most mature consideration, therefore, I thought it incumbent on me to make an effort to break through these difficulties, by expedite my reception. The Convention, I knew, possessed the sovereign authority of the nation; and I presumed that, by addressing myself to that body, and especially in the present state of things, I should have availed of the censure of any subordinate department, but perhaps relieve it from an unpleasant dilemma, and at the same time, make an experiment of the real disposition of this country towards ours. The latter consideration I deemed of some importance, as it would ascertain to me a fact which might have influence upon my conduct on other occasions.
sions. I therefore addressed a letter to the President of the Convention, of which the enclosed, No. 1, is a copy, and was happy to find it was well received; for it was immediately taken, by a member present, to the committee of public safety, by whom a report was made in two hours afterwards to the Convention, and a decree adopted by the latter body, of which No. 2 is a copy, for my reception by the Convention itself at two the following day. I deemed it my duty to avail myself of this opportunity to dissipate, if possible, by the documents in my possession, impressions which had been made, and were still making, of the unfriendly disposition of the American Government towards the liberty and happiness of the French nation. At the same time, therefore, that I presented my credentials, I laid before the Convention the declarations of the Senate and House of Representatives, as conveyed by the President through the Secretary of State, with an assurance that I was authorized to declare that the President was actuated by similar sentiments. The communication was received in a manner very interesting, and which, furnished, at the same time, the strongest proof of the affection entertained by the French nation for the United States of America. The enclosed, No. 3, is a copy of my address to the Convention, and of the President's answer. Every department has since shown the strongest disposition to prove its attachment to their ally, by embracing every opportunity which the slightest incident, has offered. A few stores brought for the accommodation of my family, in the ship which I sailed, were arrested as cargo, because no declaration of purchase by the captain. This was casually heard by the committee of public safety, and, without any intimation from me, by their order restored. But being desirous more formally to testify their regard, the commissary of foreign affairs announced to me yesterday, that he was instructed, in my name, to appropriate a house for my use, as minister of the United States of such accommodations and in such part of the city as I would designate. The enclosed No. 4 is a copy of his letter and of my reply. These latter acts, it is true, may be deemed in some measure acts of ceremony. So far, however, as they furnish any indication of the disposition of this country towards our own, it is a favorable one.

I have found here many friends. I conjecture it a new predilection, which, were taken at sea and brought in, in derogation of the treaty of amity and commerce. I intend immediately to make an effort to have that order rescinded, and compensation rendered for the injury sustained. I have written to Mr. Fenwick, who is best acquainted with the affair of the Bordeaux embargo, to request his attendance here, or to forward such documents as will enable me to pursue, with suitable information, the interest of those who were affected by it. And I shall likewise bring forward, at the same time, the claims of others of our citizens for supplies rendered to the Government of St. Domingo.

The position of the armies is nearly the same as when I wrote you last. No action has been fought, nor any other material change taken place since.

A perfect tranquillity, too, continues to reign throughout the republic. The execution of Robespierre and his associates has produced the same effect everywhere. Every person seems to be freed from an oppression which was daily increasing, and to be freed from the authority of the people, and covered with the mask of patriotism. It is, however, said, that others, who have been equally guilty, (for Robespierre, who was a timid man, could not have made the majority of the committee vote against their own opinion) will, probably, yet be brought to justice. Of this I shall be able to give you further information in my next letter.

The resolution, which I suggested in my last, contemplated in the organization of the committees and revolutionary tribunal, is now completed, or nearly so. I will enclose you copies of the decrees in my next. A great number of prisoners have been discharged, who were confined here and in other parts of the republic, in consequence of a decree that those should be liberated who were committed upon suspicion only. It was, however, greatly unfortunate that Robespierre was not cut off sooner, for it is most certain that his last days were stained with some of the innocent blood of the republic.

The vice consul has not yet arrived, and, to be candid, I doubt, when he does, whether he will be received or not. A native of this country is, at the present moment, unable to render any service to our own, although he may have always resided here, and his political principles may be disapproved. But one who has been absent is considered, if not an emigrant, at best, indifferent, to the revolution, and therefore odious. If this gentleman was here, I think it probable he is confined at the part where he landed. I deem this unfortunate, but for there is much business which properly belongs to the consular department here; and all the commercial affairs of the republic are transacted here.

No. 1.

Mr. Monroe to the President and Representatives of the French People in Convention assembled.

PARIS, August 14th, 1794.

CITIZEN PRESIDENT:

Having lately arrived here, with authority from the President of the United States of America to represent those States in quality of minister plenipotentiary with the French republic, and not knowing the competent department to whom his business belonged, I have thought it my duty to make known my mission immediately to the representatives of the nation. To them it belongs to fix the day, and prescribe the mode, by which I shall be acknowledged as the representative of their ally and sister republic. They will, therefore, have the goodness to designate to me the Department to which I shall present myself, to be recognized in the character I bear.

I make to you this communication with the greater pleasure, because it gives me an opportunity, not only to testify to the representatives of the free citizens of France, my own devotion to the cause of liberty, but of assuring them, at the same time, and in the most solemn manner, of the profound interest which the Government and People of America take in the liberty, the success, and prosperity, of the French republic.

No. 2.

The following decree was passed by the Convention:

ART. 1. The minister plenipotentiary of the United States shall be introduced into the bosom of the Convention, to-morrow, at two o'clock, P.M. He shall then explain the object of his mission, and, after which, the President shall salute him fraternally, in testimony of the friendship which unites the American and French people.

ART. 2. The President of the Convention shall write a letter to the President of the United States, and transmit to him the process verbal of this sitting.

No. 3.

The following address was presented by Mr. Monroe, the day following:

Citizens President and Representatives of the French People:

My admission into this assembly, in presence of the French nation, (for all the citizens of France are represented here) to be recognized as the representative of the American republic, impresses me with a degree of sensibility which I cannot conceal. It was one of proof of that friendship and regard which the French nation has always shown to their ally, the United States of America.
The following communications from the Department of State were, at the same time, delivered by Mr. Monroe:

To the Committee of Public Safety of the French republic.

PHILADELPHIA, June 10th, 1794.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States of America, has the honor of communicating to the committee of public safety for the French republic that, on the 24th day of April, 1794, it was unanimously resolved, by the House of Representatives, as follows:

"That the letter of the committee of public safety of the French republic, addressed to Congress, be transmitted to the President of the United States, and that he be requested to enable the minister of the French republic to be answered on behalf of this House, in terms expressive of their sensibility for the friendly and affectionate manner in which they have addressed the Congress of the United States, with an unequivocal assurance that the Representatives of the People of the United States have much interest in the happiness and prosperity of the French republic."

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States of America, has the honor of representing to the committee of public safety for the French republic, that, on the 25th of April, in the present year, it was unanimously resolved, by the House of Representatives, as follows:

"That the letter of the committee of public safety of the French republic, addressed to Congress, be transmitted to the President of the United States, and that he be requested to enable the minister of the French republic to be answered on behalf of this House, in terms expressive of their sensibility for the friendly and affectionate manner in which they have addressed the Congress of the United States, with an unequivocal assurance that the Representatives of the People of the United States have much interest in the happiness and prosperity of the French republic.

The President of the United States has caused this honorable notice of the resolution to be transmitted to the Department of State. In no manner can it be more properly discharged, than by seizing the occasion of declaring to the ally of the United States, that the cause of liberty, in the defence of which so much American blood and treasure have been lavished, is cherished by our republic, with increasing enthusiasm; that, under the standard of liberty, wherever it shall be displayed, the affection of the United States is all along rally; and that the successes of those who stand forth as her avengers, will be gloried in by the United States, and will be felt as the successes of themselves and the other friends of humanity.

Yes, representatives of our ally, your communication has been addressed to those who share in your fortunes, and who take a deep interest in the happiness and prosperity of the French republic.

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

The French people have not forgotten that it is to the American people they owe their initiation into the cause of liberty. It was in admiring the sublime insurrection of the American people against Britain, once so haughty, but now so humble; it was in taking, themselves, arms to second your courageous efforts, and in cementing your independence by the blood of our brave warriors, that the French people learned, in their turn, to break the sceptre of tyranny, and to elevate the statue of liberty on the wreck of a throne, supported, during fourteen centuries, only by crimes and by corruption.

How, then, should it happen that we should not be friends? Why should we not associate the mutual means of prosperity that our commerce and navigation offer to two people freed by each other? But it is not merely a diplomatic alliance—it is the sweetest fraternity, and the most fruct, at the same time, that must unite us—this it is that indeed unites us; and this union shall be forever indissoluble, as it will forever the dread of tyrants, the safe-guard of liberty, and the preservation of all the social and philanthropic virtues.

In bringing to us, citizen, the pledge of this union, so dear to us, it could not fail to be received with the liveliest emotions. It is now five years since an usurper of the sovereignty of the people would have received you with the pride which belongs alone to vice; and he would have thought it much to have given to the minister of a free people some tokens of an insulent protection. But, to-day, the sovereign people themselves, by the organ of their faithful representatives, receive you; and you see the tenderness, the effusion of soul, that accompanies this simple and touching ceremony. I am impatient to give you the fraternal embrace, which I am ordered to give in the name of the French people. You shall receive it in the name of the American people, and let this spectacle complete the annihilation of an impious coalition of tyrants.
The Committee of Foreign Affairs to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

Paris, 4th Fructidor, 24th year of the republic.

Citizen:

After having received the representative of our ally with the most distinguished marks of affection, the Government of the republic desires to do every thing which depends on it to make his residence in France agreeable to him. With this view the committee of public safety authorizes me to offer you, in the name of the republic, the assurance of its esteem and good wishes. The annexation of Algeria to France, therefore, to make known to you my intentions in this respect; as, likewise, to designate the quarter which will be most agreeable to you.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Committee of Foreign Relations for the French republic.

Paris, August 22, 1794.

Citizen:

I was favored yesterday with yours of that date, informing me that the committee of public safety had authorized you, in the name of the republic, to appropriate a house for my use, as minister of their ally, the United States. Much honor do I derive from the act, and design to accept it with peculiar satisfaction, because I consider it as a proof of the sincere regard which the committee entertain for their ally, whose servant I am. But, upon this occasion, I am not permitted to indulge, in any respect, my own opinion or feelings.

The constitution of my country, an extract from which is here annexed, has prescribed a line of conduct to me, and which it is my duty to follow. The committee of public safety, and you, citizen, respect too highly the fundamental laws of your own country not to approve my reason for declining the kind favor you have made me. I shall, however, immediately communicate it to our Government, and doubt not it will produce there the good effect it merits.

Extract from the Constitution of the United States.

"No title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States, and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State."

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, September 15, 1794.

Sir:

As soon as I could command a moment's leisure, I applied myself to the immediate duties of my station. I found many of my countrymen here, laboring under embarrassments of a serious kind, growing out of the war, and was soon furnished with like complaints from others in several of the seaports. Correct information upon every point was my first object: for, unless I knew the nature and extent of the evil, I could not seek a remedy. I encouraged, therefore, by my letters, these representations, as the only means by which I could acquire it. Nor was it my object to cause the complaints already had to be too deeply affected and long delayed, to be remedied upon the present occasion. In the course of a few weeks, I believe most of the complaints which had been occasioned by the war, and especially where the parties were present, either in person or by attorney, were laid before me. By analyzing them, I found they might be classed under the following heads:

1. Those who were injured by the embargo at Bordeaux.
2. Those who had claims upon the republic for supplies rendered to the Government of St. Domingo.
3. Those who had brought cargoes in for sale, and were detained by delay of payment, or some other cause.
4. Those who had been brought in by the ships of the republic, in derogation of the treaty of amity and commerce, and were confined, in derogation of the treaty of amity and commerce, or rights of citizenship in the United States.

Upon the investigation of these heads, and the next following, so far as compensation to the injured parties was in question, I had no difficulty how to act. Your instructions had fully marked the course to be taken. I therefore required that compensation be made as soon as possible, and upon just principles, according to the contract, where such was the case, and the fair estimated value, where it was not. But the two latter involved in them something more than the mere adjustment of existing claims, and which closed the scene when that was made. They grew out of measures, which, if suffered to continue, might create like injuries every week, and which would require a like interposition on my part. Therefore considered it my duty, not only to require a full indemnity to the claimants, as in the other instances, but to mount to the source of the evil, and seek a remedy commensurate therewith.

I found that the delays above spoken of did not proceed from interest or design on their part; from interest they could not: for they not only disgusted, and often injured the claimants, but likewise exposed the Government to controversial loss, upon account of demurrage; and if there was no motive of interest, there could be none for design. They proceeded, in fact, from the system of trade adopted here, by which the whole commerce of the country was taken into the hands of the republic itself. The regulation was such, that none but the officers of Government could purchase, nor could any contract be concluded and executed in any of the seaports, or elsewhere, than in Paris. This threw every case into the hands of a board of commissaries, in this city, who were otherwise borne down with an immense weight of the most extensive and complicated duties. The defect in the own arrangements here, increased the embarrassment: for, as we had no consul here, every captain, or supercargo, became his own negotiator, and as they were generally ignorant of the city, the language, and of the prices last given, they were badly calculated for the purpose. Every new cargo formed a distinct negotiation; and, as there was no system on the part of the venders, who, as wished, as was natural, to make the most of their voyage, they usually asked an extravagant price for their merchandise in the first instance. This occasioned a kind of traffic between the parties, and which frequently terminated in the disgust of both, and particularly of the venders, who, after they were weary of dealing with the clerks in the Department, and whose duty it was to receive them, generally assigned the business over to some agent, and who, as he was not clothed with any public character, could neither be much respected by the French Government, nor possessed in any high degree of the confidence of his employers. Such was the state of our trade in this republic, and such the cause of the delay. As soon, therefore, as I became sufficiently well acquainted with the subject, I thought my duty to bring it before the Government, and desire, on its part, a suitable remedy; and if the person lately appointed does not soon arrive, I shall deem it equally necessary to nominate some one as consul, provisionally, to take charge of the business on our; and if he does arrive, I am by no means certain it will remedy the difficulty, for reasons I shall hereafter explain.

I had more difficulty in determining how to act on the fourth point. I was not instructed to desire a repeal of the decree, and did not know but that it had been tolerated from the soundest motives of political expediency. This republic had declared war, from a justifiable motive, against a nation that had infamously sold our own people to slave the negroes; and the public safety, therefore, had a strong disposition to make their own people feel the unpleasing nature of the proceedings of the French. This consideration entitled it to some attention in return. An attempt to press it within the pale of the stipulation contained in the 23d and 24th articles of the treaty of amity and commerce, might give birth to sentiments of a different kind, and create a disposition to call on us to execute that of the treaty of alliance. The subject was, therefore, of the utmost delicacy, and I saw that I could not enter on it without the greatest care. But yet I was persuaded that France gained nothing by the departure, and had reason to believe, if it were otherwise, that she would, at the present time, lose it for our actual mediation; and I knew its importance, and especially as it would deprive the cabinet of St. James of the smallest pretext for continuing the violation on its part. Upon full consideration of all these circumstances, the paper presented was drawn, and I trust, whatever may be its effect, it will have the approbation of the President, since it may produce a beneficial one, and has proved a decided hit in the public mind. I expect an answer as soon as circumstances will permit, paying due regard to the immense weight of business before that Department.

Upon the article respecting citizenship, I have as yet said nothing. I did not wish to complicate the subjects which I presented before us, too much at that one time. But I am now to attend to, as shall likewise the claim for reimbursement of 50,000 dollars, advanced to the French emigrants from St. Domingo.

Nothing of great importance has lately taken place in the public councils. The remaining spirit of ancient party has, however, drawn together those who are opposed to its principles, and this party is still in existence, and seems to have a great natural force drawn, and to lurk in the bosoms of the more inveterate only. Happily a different spirit, more congenial with the temper of the nation, and which inclines to humanity, peace, and concord, seems to pervade the great mass of the Convention. I think this latter will soon prevail, so as not only to prevent, at least for the present, further enormities, but to heal, in some degree, the wounds which have already been inflicted. Some latter circumstances authorize this expectation. Barrère, Colot d'Herbois, and Billaud de Varennes, of the committee of public safety, and several of the committee of sureté générale, were suspected by many of countenanced and supported the measures of Robespierre and it was apprehended that, after the perfect and predetermined calm which ought to precede an execution should subside, some disasters of that subject would ensue. Accordingly they were lately denounced by Le Cozé de Versailles, who brought forward a long list of charges against them. But it was immediately seen, that the party in favor of the denunciation, though violent, was weak. The convention heard the accusation with patience, and decided against it. Many of this party were now in their turn alike agitated and alarmed, because they thought they saw, in the rejection of the motion, the invincible strength of the other party, and the certainty of their own fate; but they were superficial observers of the course of the revolution, and of the theatre on which they acted. They did not perceive how it was to be expected, at such a period, that a party, which had so often been the object of persecution and that great and still resists, should be equal to the vexations and outrages of which it was susceptible, both, and render their extravagant and pernicious efforts abortive and harmless. This latter fact was farther demonstrated by an event which followed immediately after. Under the organization of the committee of public safety, it became necessary to redress the injuries of foreigners; and the lower house would of course have been re-chosen. But the contrary was the case, for they were every one rejected, and others preferred in their stead. I have mentioned this incident, because I deem it an important one in the character of the present moment, tending to prove the certainty with which the revolution progresses towards a happy close. Since the preponderance of those councils, which are equally distinguished for their wisdom, temperance and humanity continues to increase.

Nor is fortune less propitious to the affairs of this republic in the field than in the cabinet. Within a few days past, Condé and Valenciennes have surrendered to its victorious arms. About 6,000 troops were taken in these garrisons, with 1,100 emigrants, and which latter were immediately put to the sword. The rigor with which the emigrants have been pursued continues nearly the same, and seems still to be dictated equally by the sentiment of the public councils and the people at large; it will not, therefore, be easily or soon removed.

The surrender of these garrisons has relieved from a state of inactivity about 50,000 men, who were immediately adopted as the army in the Meuse, and on the frontier of Holland. These armies are at present of great strength and certainty, upon the ordinary rules of calculation, not to be resisted by the force now embodied against them. In point of numbers, they are by far superior, and they possess the means by which this superiority may be increased at pleasure, and to any amount. Their discipline, too, is as good as can well be whilst on the other side, every thing wears a more gloomy aspect. Their troops are dispirited, and daily wasting away by the events of war, and reinforcements have been for a long time past with difficulty obtained, and seem now to be exhausted, or at least at a stand. And to increase the embarrassment on their part, it is said a dispute has taken place between Cobourg and York. For the command, in case they should unite their forces; the latter having set up a claim in consequence of the great force of Prussians, &c. in British pay.

Cobourg occupies at present a position near Maastricht, and York one in the neighbourhood of Berge-op-zoom. It is thought the French will direct their principal force there, and, as important consequences, open a speculation, and no effort be made to deprive Holland of its chief barrier. They are strong and well provided, but deemed by no means impregnable to the arder and enterprise of the French troops. It is therefore probable some severe encounters may soon take place in each quarter; for surely nothing but absolute despairs will induce the combined Powers to abandon them, and which they must otherwise do, in case the French continue to exert themselves with their usual vigour.

Mr. Monroe to the Committee of Public Safety.

PAris, September 3, 1794.

There are some subjects to which I wish to call your attention, and which I deem of equal importance to both republics. They have grown out of the occurrences of the present war, have pressed particularly hard upon the United States, and will, I doubt not, be immediately rectified in a manner becoming the character of the French nation, and the factitious commerce.

The first respects the departure, on the part of France, from the 23d and 24th articles of the treaty of commerce subsisting between the two republics.

The second, the embargo of our vessels at Bordeaux, and the injuries arising from it to those whom it concerns. There is a claim of some of our citizens for supplies furnished to the government of St. Domingo, authorized by bills upon the minister of the republic in Philadelphia, by bills upon France, and by mandates, and other instruments usual in such cases.

As is the case with the treaty of commerce, it is stipulated that free ships shall make free goods, and that all goods shall be free, except those which are termed contraband; and that no dispute might arise as to contraband, all those which should be deemed such on the one hand, and which should be deemed free on the other, are particularly specified in the 94th.

I am led to bring this subject to your view, briefly to observe, that these articles have been dispensed with on your part; that our vessels, laden with merchandise, not only the property of your enemies, made free by these articles, but likewise of our own citizens, the latter of which was always free, have been brought into your estuaries, detained for a great length of time, from their proprietors otherwise injured or exposed to great danger, many of our ships, cargoes, losses, and injuries. But I will not dwell upon this subject in this view, because I frankly own to you, it is painful for me thus to contemplate it. I wish to reserve my free comments for the other side of the picture, when I shall favorably explain the motives of the act, in communicating to my country what I have learned to communicate, and upon this friendly intimation only, the ready acquiescence with which the decree was rescinded.

It may be said that Great Britain has rendered us the same injury, and that, when she shall change her conduct in that respect, France will likewise follow her example. But the case is wider; and I will state one, which more especially the law of nations, however clear its doctrine, even with respect to contraband; but with France it is in both respects regulate by treaty. Besides, we are the allies, and, what is more interesting, the friends of France. These considerations naturally inspire in the councils of the two countries different sentiments in regard to us; and if Britain proves true to those which belong to her situation, shall we, on the other hand, find France reluctant to cherish such ties as are friendly to us, and consider them as measures for our injuries? Will our ally defend us like injuries? Will our ally defend that with that nation in rivalry, which shall harass our commerce most, and do us the greatest detriment? This is surely not a relation for the two republics to bear towards each other. Other sentiments will, I hope, inspire their common councils—sentiments more congenial with the nature of our situation; sentiments which will look to the citizens of both countries.

If the French republic gained the smallest benefit from the regulation, there might be some motive for adhering to it. But this cannot, it is presumed, be the case. The most to be derived from it is the occasional seizure of a straggling vessel, destined for the ports of Spain and Portugal; for they are excluded from the ports of England, except under the regulation. It must be remembered, however, that France, as she has been able to assert her rights in the West Indies, would be their destination; add to which, the charges attending the seizure and conducting of vessels from their course must be great, and it make it not only an uncertain, but unprofitable mode of supply.

But if the regulation is understood, it will lead to no mischief. It will be such as, though under the protection of our flag, the commerce of Britain may be carried on with advantage to her, and detriment to France. But a moment’s reflection will demonstrate that this apprehension cannot, in any degree, be well founded; for the navigation act of England, whose great principles have been wisely adopted here, forbids almost altogether any such commerce as that which cannot be carried on in the ports of the colonies, nor the productions or manufactures of any other country, be carried in our bottoms to Great Britain. This restriction must, in a great degree, inhibit the use of our vessels in any but the direct trade between the two nations: for it is not probable that Great Britain will use the vessels of America to export her cargoes to other countries to their own advantage, and return, they would generally be left there empty and unsold. On the contrary, we know that her practice in such cases has been, not to countenance the navigation of any other country at the expense of her own, but to protect the latter by convoys. But if this were otherwise, it is to be presumed that one of the effects of the present system of success of the French arms, will have decisively settled itself, before it could have produced any material effect.

It must be obvious that the conduct of Great Britain, and especially in regard to the articles of contraband, must depend, in a great measure, upon that of France in this particular: for if France declines to rescind this decree, the articles, as well as the cargoes, which belong to the French, will make a purchase of the vessels of the commerce of this country. But if France should comply in the first instance, she will put Great Britain in an embarrassing dilemma: for if she refuses afterwards, it will not only tend to cement our union with France, but combine all America in the condemnation of the conduct of Britain and if they should then comply, to France will be the credit of having given force to it.

At the same time I express to you a desire that this decree be rescinded, and the parties heretofore affected by it compensated for the injuries they have received, I consider it my duty to add some observations upon the recommendations detrimental to the measure. A regulation of this kind, in its fullest extent, must prove very injurious to both countries, and especially to France. Trade cannot exist under it. It will soon happen that not a single adventurer will seek the French ports; no merchant will enter them but by constraint. The consequence must be, that the commerce of America, so extensive and productive, and especially in those articles in greatest demand here, will be either reduced, or altogether lost; and here by means a regulation of the kind adverse to national interests—a resource which, however productive, should not be the sole one, for many reasons; but, more especially, because the produce of the country, having thus become the property of France, will be liable, by the law of nations, to the requisition and satisfaction of all nations as to the produce of her own property. In the case of France, you would be secure in the respect which is due to your flag by other nations, and which would enable our citizens in their own bottoms to supply, in abundance, your markets, (and in which I trust we shall succeed) it would be of no use to you; and, lastly, because the competition of private adventurers would thus be destroyed—a competition which, with the mutual interests and satisfaction of France and America, is not only calculated to the advantage of the European market, but, by making known constantly and regularly the prices in America, form a check on their conduct, and furnish the best test of their integrity.

You will observe I do not complain that the public are the sole purchasers, and regulate, at pleasure, what shall be the price of the cargo, and such as the vender as paid for their cargoes in some commodity or specie, at their option; or that agents of the public are appointed in the United States, and as many as may be thought necessary, to purchase our productions on public account and send them here. These are subjects which the legislators of the republic will have much to consider, and the settlement, regular and permanent, of these matters is what I wish the most. But the market may be opened freely to the enterprises of my countrymen, and which will be the case, provided they be permitted to leave them immediately, if they do not like the market, and despatched without delay in case they do. To accomplish the first point, a general order only will be requisite to the officers of the customs, or other persons in authority in the several ports; and the latter, a regulation of the prices to be immediately given by these officers upon all occasions, when a vessel should arrive, and which might be furnished, as often as any change should be deemed necessary. This would, I am satisfied, banish every cause of complaint; greatly increase the competition; and of the supply of the market, and at a much less charge.

Upon the second subject, the Bordeaux embargo, I find the committee has already passed an arret, which secures to the persons interested an indemnity for the delay and other injuries sustained; it only remains, therefore, to adjust the amount of the claims, and pay the parties entitled to it. The claims approved by the citizens to the Government of St. Domingo, is likewise a matter of account, and which it earnestly hoped will be immediately adjusted and paid. A person authorized will appear in support of the claims, with the evidence, before any board or tribunal which shall be appointed for the purpose.

I have to observe that I shall be happy to give every aid in my power to facilitate the adjustment and subsequent payment of these several classes of claims. So far as they are well founded, I doubt not they will be allowed by the French republic; and, where this is not the case, they will not be supported by me. In an aggregate view, they with the great mass of American merchants. It is of importance for France to cultivate that interest, and to be a solid benefit to the republic, the American Government, and my countrymen in general, will not only bear the departure with patience, but with pleasure. It is from the confidence alone, which I entertain, that this departure cannot be thought improper. A confidant is the only sure guard against error, in removing every possible cause of uneasiness, and conciliating still more and more towards each other, the affections and interests of both republics, and thereby cementing more closely their union, that I have taken the liberty, as connected with the other concerns, to bring the subject before you. To cement that union, in other situations, has long been the object of my efforts. And it is with the satisfaction of being able to announce in this instance, that it has been the object of my efforts and for both countries, America and France thus united, the one the greatest Power in the European world, and the other rapidly repulsing the wars of war, and rising to the first rank in the scale of nations; both bound by, and maintaining an immense space along, the Atlantic; abundant in productions suit the demand of each others and, above all, their republics have nothing to fear from foreign danger, and every thing to hope from the happiest and
FOREIGN RELATIONS.

From the Secretary of the State of the United States to Mr. Monroe.
PHILADELPHIA, September 23, 1814.

SIR:

My letter of the 30th July last having been repeated by duplicate, I shall only recommend to your particular and immediate attention the subjects of it.

The spoliations and vexations which are imputable to the French cruisers, and among them, the injuries to our citizens which, in the name of the government, the people are to have redress of, are, to be sure, of a nature to quicken the sensibilities of those who are unacquainted with them; but the excitement, in the individuals interested, a flame, which now and then bursts forth in violent expressions, and which, you, therefore, cannot quiet too soon by a proper adjustment. You will find in the enclosed copy of Mr. Fauchet's letter to me, of the 1st August, the strong assurances which he has given on this head.

The expediency of an indemnity to be paid to these unfortunate neighbors, is placed under the care of Mr. Boland, who goes to seek compensation on account of the ship Fame. It is a strong case, and will back your remonstrances, however pointed they may be. I do not state the munificence, as his documents speak explicitly, and he himself will be on the spot, ready for further explanation. There is nothing in it you cannot render yourself virtuous in the eyes of every community as on those occasions. Indeed, I flatter myself with the expectation of hearing shortly of considerable advances towards final success on your part.

Mr. James Anderson has been highly recommended, and his letters have shown him to deserve some degree of notice from the United States, for he was not suggested to be a President in the minds of many, because it was presumed from some information, which was received, that the places for which consuls were designated at the last session, were not suitable to his views. You will therefore take the earliest opportunity of inquiring into his character and respectability, and inform us.

A claim of Mr. Granger is also forwarded to you, in order that you may pursue the same measures relative to it, as in the others of a similar kind.

Mr. Boland has promised to deliver to you your quota of newspapers. From the beginning of August to this hour, they contain the last interesting dispatches of the hour. These should have been communicated to you, as they arose, if conveyances to France were not, of all others, the most difficult to be obtained. You will recollect the murmurs which have long prevailed there against the excise. At length the house of General Neville, the inspector, was attacked by a large party of armed men, in the day, and burnt to the ground, together with most, if not all, the out houses. Foreseeing that Government could not be matters of excitement, perhaps, some preposterous views of ambition and personal aggrandizement, the leaders, to render themselves formidable, contrived to give an appearance of an universal commotion, and association of sentiment. A large body appeared in arms on Braddock's field, and appointed the 14th of August for the meeting of deputies from all the townships at Parkison's ferry. Writing the Virginia counties to send deputies also. The President despatched Senator Ross, Judge Yates, and our Attorney General Brawford, as commissioners; having first required twelve thousand five hundred militia to be held in readiness, in certain proportions, in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware. A Committee was appointed, to meet on the second, to be held at Redstone a later day. Our commissioners unanimously prevailed upon those with whom they conferred, to agree to urge the people to peace. But the Redstone opinions were not so propitious as those of Parkison's ferry. The people there assembled were dissatisfied with the conduct of the former committee of conference, and appointed another, which, like the former, were unanimous for the purpose. Still the people themselves were to be consulted, and the 11th September fixed for the taking of their votes. The result has been, that every leading man has subscribed to the terms required by the commissioners; that near three thousand men above the age of sixteen have submitted; that there is no real danger of an opposition in the field. However, the militia having been on their march for some time, and it being certain that, although open resistance may not be found, the laws cannot be executed unless some degree of military force be at hand to support the officers, their movements have not been countermanded. The command is intended for Governor Lee, of Virginia; but the President goes on towards Carlisle, on Monday, with a view, after march, to the rapid increase of the militia, and will decide whether to proceed or return. The principal information, which is to be procured from the newspapers, will be the first and second proclamation, the representation of the Secretary of the Treasury to the President, and the proceedings of the commissioners. In a day or two their report will be concluded, which will upon this subject be the white or a small cloud of Pennsylvania. Still the people themselves were to be consulted, and the 11th September fixed for the taking of their votes. However, you may be assured that the insurrection will very quickly be subdued, and you can err in no political calculation built on this event.

The spirit which the States have manifested is astonishing. Throughout Virginia, to favor the insurgents would be disgrace, and actual personal danger. Some of their emissaries produced a momentary disturbance in Fredericktown, in Maryland, but it was soon quelled by the rapid approach of the militia. In Pennsylvania, from some mismanagement, the call of the militia was not hastily obeyed. But such an enthusiasm has now grown up and been raging for a considerable time, that the very Quakers have entered the ranks and marched to Pittsburg. New Jersey seems to be a nursery of warriors, determined to support the constitution. Even the democratic societies have been organized into a body of militia; and the President has written to the Sheriffs of the several counties, with a view to hasten their numbers, which will be reenforced by the militia already added. Judge, then, how indispensable it is, that you should keep the French republic in good humor with us.

Spain has, by a conduct similar to that of Great Britain towards us, imposed the necessity of sending an envoy extraordinary thither, also, for the negotiation at a stand, on the most unaccountable pretexts. My conviction is firm, that Mr. Charles Maddison and Mr. Wilson are crotchial in nothing but a hate against the United States, and a determination to harass them through the Indians.

If, however, a report has come many ways, be true, that General Wayne, on the 20th August, left between one hundred and fifty and three hundred Indians dead on the field near the Rapids of the Miami, their execution might have fallen, and that their heads were of worth.

I am, &c.,

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.
Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

FRANCE. 679.

PARIS, October 16, 1794.

Sr.:—I gave you, in my last, a sketch of the embarrassments under which our commerce labored in the ports of the republic, and of my efforts to emanuate it, as shown by my letter to the committee of public safety, a copy of which was likewise forwarded. To this I have, as yet, received no answer, although I have requested it more than once. To those, however, to which I was unfavourably informed, that the subject was under consideration, and would be decided on as soon as possible.

But as these propositions were of extensive import, and connected with the system of commerce and supply which had been adopted here, it is probable I shall not be favored with an answer until the subject is generally reviewed. I do not, however, forget to press upon you the importance of the zeal and energy with which it pursued its object. Through the channel of trade it was found, or suspected, that the principles of the revolution were chiefly impaired; that, through it, not only the property of the emigrants and the wealth of the country were exported, but that foreign money was likewise thrown in, whereby the internal dissensions of the nation were increased. At one time it was believed, that most of the evils, to which France was a prey, proceeded from this source. Many remedies were, in consequence, applied, but still the disease continued. Finally, an effort was made to eradicate the cause, by exterminating private trade altogether, and taking the whole commerce of the country into the hands of the decree, to this effect, accordingly passed on the — day of October, 1793, and which has since continued in force.

But now many circumstances incline to a change of this system. The act itself was considered as a consummation of the French party, and the principal party of the French nation, and the roll of those who received their supplies under the guillotine. By it, the commercial interest, as distinct from the landed, and dividing, in certain respects, with opposite views, the councils of the country, was totally destroyed. All private mercantile intercourse with foreign nations was cut off; and so severe were the measures, and great the odium, on the mercantile character, that, when the business of foreign commerce was done away, the motive for the act itself was greatly diminished. Accordingly the public mind was seen vibrating back to its former stations; and in which it was greatly aided by the fortune of the late dominant party, whose principal characters, like those, in whose turn, settled accounts with the republic, the receipt of the guillotine. Thus we find, and especially in countries, that extraordinary measures not only do not remain those who bear the character of their author, but frequently share his hate. The fall of the Brissotian party extirpated private trade; the fall of Robespierre's may probably soon restore it.

A fall of a corruption or institution, more or less detestable, though none seem willing so prominently to take the lead as to make themselves responsible for the consequences. The only active interest that I can perceive against it, is composed, of all those who have managed the public trade and been intrusted with the public monies for that purpose. They readily foresee that a change will not only take from them the public cash, but likewise lead to an adjustment of their accounts for past transactions. It is, however, generally the fortune of an opposition of this kind, to precipitate the adoption of the measure it wishes to avert: for as every one suspects that its motive is not sound, and which is proportionally increased by the degree of zeal shown, so every one feels an interest in defeating it.

I have endeavored in my propositions to confine them entirely to external objects, by suggesting such remedies as might be adopted without any interference with the interior general system of France. By so doing I hoped that the injuries of which we complain might be sooner redressed, and not made dependent on the great events which happen here.

I soon found that the extraordinary expedient, to which this republic had recourse, of excluding individuals from trade, and conducting it themselves, would require, in a great measure, a correspondent regulation on our part. For, if the conduct of the public servants, on the one side, was not in some measure supervised, and which it could not be, but by public agents, on the other, the impositions which might be practised on our improvvident countrymen would be for ever here, and another, serious, and probably an unfortunate, chase of supplies for the republic, or the execution of a contract, the bias of the Government and of the people would be in favor of the former. The consuls, under the superintendence of the minister, forms their natural bulwark, to be maintained of this kind. They are, in a certain sense, the consular. But to guard them against those proceeding from the source above described, it should be organized with peculiar care. I was sorry, therefore, upon inspecting into our establishment, to find, that, whatever might be its merits, in other situations, it was by no means, in general, endowed with sufficient strength or vigor for the present crisis. American citizens alone can furnish an adequate protection to their countrymen. In the hands of a Frenchman, or any other foreigner, the consular functions lie dormant. In every litigated case the former shrinks into the citizen, and trembles before the authority of his country; and the latter, especially if the subject of one of the coalesced parties, has an irrevocable commission of sufficient force to exempt him from the decree, which would otherwise doom him to a prison. I annex, at the foot of this, a list of consuls and consular agents, with a note of those who have already been actual arrestation and confinement, and by which you will be better enabled to comprehend the justice of these remarks.

My situation was, therefore, in every view, beyond measure an embarrassing one. But as there was no consul or agent, of any kind or country, here, where the whole business was concentrated, and every transaction closed, it became, on that account, infinitely more so: for I was, in consequence, not only directly surrounded by many of my countrymen, complaining of delays and injuries, and entreating my intercession for redress, but applied to by them themselves, to settle their respective accounts. I was solicited to interpose in every kind of distress, to which they might be prostrate, in all cases, in which there were more of the same description. I could not even go through the forms in the offices which were necessary to verify facts, and which, if true, furnished ground for a demand for money, and which was enforced upon any suppositions by the law. It was a law which must be, until verified. I remained thus, for some time. In expectation of the arrival of Mr. Duvernet; although I was apprehensive such an event, in consequence of the general objection above stated, and the decree, which applied particularly to his case, instead of affording relief, would plunge me into a new embarrassment. But finding that he had submitted to the public business, for his component parts; and that the moment his commission, which nominated my secretary, Mr. Skipwith, provisionally, consular for this city, on the —day of —, and notified it to this Government; a copy of which, and of the answer of the commissary of foreign affairs, I herewith enclose you. To him I was since assigned the interesting duty of developing and demonstrating the cause of these difficulties, by an appeal to the principles on which our relations with that country are formed, and agents, and in several of those ports, to render him a statement of those within their particular jurisdictions. Thus enlightened, he will make a report upon the whole subject to me, and which I will immediately lay before the committee, for their consideration, and as with his consent necessarily.

At present I can say nothing decisively upon the subject of a general arrangement of the consulate. What I have said may furnish some hints which may be useful. But I wish, before any thing is definitely done in that respect, you the result of my further remarks on it. Mr. Fenwick will be here in a few days, and from whom, I doubt not, you will receive immediate word of information. In the office in which I have placed him. But as he undertook it without the prospect of emolument in the official line, (for, in truth, the duties required of him are not strictly consular, but novel, and growing out of the emergence of} try where these sentiments particularly head. and exhibits warmth and the latter are not satisfied by such persons, two of whom are said to be then confined at Dunkirk as spies. The subject was, in point of principle, and I was really embarrassed how to act in it, so as to satisfy this Government, and do justice to the powers, the British and the American, it essentially requires. And yet the argument was equally strong on the other side: for, if the subject of another Power, it was equally difficult to distinguish between such and any other subject of the same Power, especially in this region, where the right of expatriation is generally denied. But, in point of experience, there was less difficulty in the case. Circumstances, in its nature, a local privilege. It implies a right, which the Government of this society. But with the if considerations of this kind are to be regarded, I can see no reason why it should not, in the present instance, be construed strictly: for, if a temporary emigrant, after availing himself of this benefit for a few years, and for the purposes of trade, in our indulgent country, chooses to abandon us, and return from whence he came, why should we follow him, on this side the Atlantic, to support, in his behalf, a privilege which can now only be claimed, at best, for private, and perhaps dishonorable purposes? Can any motive be urged of sufficient force to induce us to embark here in this kind of controversy, at the hazard of our national character, and the good will of the nation believing in such a cause? It may be that the genuine sentiments of the people in general are stronger than I imagined it will not, of the kind that merits encouragement: for it will rarely happen that a single member of that respectable list of philosophers, artists, and yeomen, who seek an asylum with us, from the troubled governments on this side the Atlantic, will ever re-cross it. These observations apply only to those who settled with, and remained, and whose sentiments and interests, in all essential respects, are the same as those of the British territory, (who, were, of course, in the common character of British subjects, equally members of our Revolution) who threw their fortunes into our scale, as being as much Americans as if they were born with us. After some discussion with the commissary on the subject, it terminated by an assurance, on my part, that I should be particularly cautious as to such characters, and release my passport to all of that description (except, in cases of hardship, and upon which he should be previously consulted) who were not actually resident within the United States. This arrangement was satisfactory to the Government, as you will perceive by the commissary's letters to me, copies of which are herewith transmitted. I shall, however, be happy to be instructed by you on that head.

The councils of this republic still continue to present to view an interesting, but by no means an alarming spectacle. Instances of animated debate, severe censure, and even vehement denunciation, sometimes take place. Notwithstanding all this, it evinces a marked difference, which is not surprising: as the war on this side of the mountain is rapidly on the decline, and, equally so, that, if the opposite act with wisdom and moderation, at the present crisis, it will not only complete its overthrow, but destroy the existence (if possible in society) of all party whatever. The agitation which now occasionally shows itself proceeds from the pressure of this last cause in the minds of the people, and is in these last times of [omitted]. The presence of war upon their enemy: for having, since the fall of the Brissotines, wielded the councils of the nation, and been accustomed to a pretty liberal use of their authority over the remaining members of that party, they bear, with pain, and without apprehension of danger, their present decline. The tone of the discussion, therefore, frequently exhibits to view the external of a violent controversy between two rival parties, nearly equally balanced, and which must terminate, under the preponderance of either, in the extirpation of the other. But this I deem only the external aspect; and upon considerations, in my judgment the most solid, I have observed, generally, that the first indications of the affairs. The second party had already broken through the restraint imposed on them by their leaders, (if, when a force is broken and routed, there can be any leader) and sally forth into extravagances, which provoke resentment, where they should only endeavor to extice pity; and whilst a different conduct is justified by the leaders themselves: for neither Barrere, Billaud of Valence, nor Genet provoced the revolution, nor, except in these last times of [omitted], and to which they confine their comments strictly, and with all suitable respect for their opponents. I observe, also, it rarely happens that any very distinguished member in the preponderating party takes share in these discussions. As the field is rather much confined in this respect: and yet, the Warrens, those who have perpetrated such enormities in their missions in the several parts of the republic, and particularly at Nantes, should escape the justice of their country.

In the movements of the present day the jacobin society has, as heretofore, borne its part. The history of this sect shows the present to be of importance to mankind, and especially that portion upon which Providence has bestowed the blessing of free government. It furnishes a lesson equally instructive to public functionaries and to private citizens. I am not yet fully possessed of the details, although I have endeavored to acquire the stock of information. To think, I own, that I am not able to write a history of the jacobin society; and yet, probably, I am now, and have been, engaged in the history of the world; a history which shows at least two great eras. The first commenced with the Revolution, and ended with the deposition of the King. The second fills the space between that event and the present day. The former of these is still further divisible into two parts, upon each of which distinct characters are marked. The first commenced with the Revolution, and ended with the last constitution or government; the second, under the constitution. During the first of these, the jacobin society was composed of almost all the enemies to the ancient despotism: for, in general, those who were friends of the public liberty, and wished its establishment under perpetual empire, were, at this time, unfettered, and authorized by the fundamental principles of the constitution. But with the adoption of the constitution many were satisfied and left it. And this, and during the second part of this era, it was France.

During the whole of the first era, therefore, or until the deposition of the King, this society may be considered as the cradle of the Revolution; for, most certainly, the republic would not have been established, if the public sentiment, as well as the means of discussion and free criticism among men and measures, contributed greatly to forward that important event.

But from that period, and through the whole of the second era, the society has acted a different part and merited a different character. The clergy, the nobility, and the royalty, who by the ways of government, had been, and continually were, the chief object of Robespierre, and under his direction the principal agent in all those atrocities which have stained this stage of the Revolution. It was by means of this society that he succeeded in cutting off the members of the two succeeding parties of Brissot and Danton, and had finally well nigh ruined the republic itself.

It may be easily fact, and very deserving of attention, that, in the more early and latter stages of this society, the best men of France were seeking an admittance into it, but from very different motives. In the commencement and until the establishment of the republic, it was resorted to by them for the purpose of promoting that great event. But in the latter stage, and until the fall of Robespierre, it was resorted to by them merely to shelter from danger. Virtually, it was a place of simple acquiescence, where one could be secure of the privilege of doing nothing; and of course the object of his persecution. Nor was any man of independent spirit, possessing them, secure from his wrath. The Jacobin society could alone furnish any kind of protection, and to this circumstance it was owing that the Jacobins were widely and uniformly coursed throughout the kingdom. This society therefore, it may be said, was the creature of Robespierre, and under his direction the principal agent in all those atrocities which have stained this stage of the Revolution. It was by means of this society that he succeeded in cutting off the members of the two succeeding parties of Brissot and Danton, and had finally well nigh ruined the republic itself.

The preponderating influence had long been in the hands of those of a different description. The preponderating influence had long been in the hands of those who seemed at the time to abet his enormities. Unfortunately for them and for their country, their presence secured only a partial exemption from danger. The preponderating influence had long been in the hands of those who seemed at the time to abet his enormities. Unfortunately for them and for their country, their presence secured only a partial exemption from danger.

In the last scene which was acted by Robespierre, and in which he placed himself at the commune in open rebellion against the Convention, it is said that this society arranged itself under his banner against that assembly. But after this fall, and which was instantaneous, it immediately endeavored to repair the error of theappointment, by offering itself upon some who were admitted to be bad members, and others who were said to have forced themselves, as at tumultuous moment, unincorporated, into the society, and who were not members at all. It even went into high crimination of Robespierre himself. But the principles of the controversy were too deeply rooted in the minds of all to be so suddenly eradicated. It was obvious that a crisis had arrived which must eventually settle the point, whether the Convention or this society should govern France, and equally so, that the public mind was, and perhaps long had been, decisively settled in favor of the former. As the catastrophe was approaching, this society, as herebefore, used at one time, an elevated or commanding tone, and at others a humiliating one. But the Convention acted with equal firmness and decision, and in the last stage of its existence, it was at a point at which it seemed the only way to throw by contrasting the wisdom, the justice, and magnanimity of its own present conduct, with the past and recent enormities of this society, is uncertain. The leading members of the preponderating party seemed doubtful upon this occasion; and the views of the people, and the expression of the sentiment of the nation, were determined, through the country, forced the convention into more decisive measures. By its order, the secretary of the society at Paris was arrested, and all the deputies from those associated with it through France, and who had arrived to deliberate upon the state of their affairs, were driven from the city, under a decree which exempted none, not inhabitants of Paris, except our countrymen. Of all France, Marseille was the only district in which its efforts produced any effect. A small commotion, excited there, was immediately quelled by the ordinary police, and who, after an example of the leaders, reported it to the Convention.

Although it may be thought that the author, in regard to this society, is uncertain: the subject is now under discussion, and I shall, I presume, be able in my next to give you the result.

The same success continues to attend the arms of the republic, and in every quarter. They have taken, since my last, in the North, Juliers, Aix-la-Chapelle, Cologne, and Bois-le-Duc; and in the south, Bellegarde, with immense store of ammunition, without it; and in March, and May, thirty in Juliers and Bois-le-Duc; at both of which latter places a general action was hazarded by the opposite generals, and in which they were routed with great loss. It is said, indeed, that the action which achieved Juliers, was among the most important of the present campaign, since they have taken since my last, in the North, the fortress of Maestricht, Bergen-op-zoom, and of Holland itself. Maestricht is now closely invested, and must fall in the course of a few weeks, since the Austrian general has obviously abandoned it to its fate. Holland must fall immediately afterwards: for there is, in truth, nothing to prevent it. Indeed I think it probable they will previously detach twenty or thirty thousand men to take possession of it: for it is generally believed to be the strongest place in the kingdom.

What effect these events may produce in England it is difficult for me to say. That Austria, Prussia, and Spain, have for some time past weared with the war, and have wished to withdraw from it, is certain. That they will withdraw from it soon, is more probable, and upon the best terms they can get. England, therefore, will have to maintain the contest alone; for Holland will be conquered, and subject to the will of the conqueror. This, however, is not the only danger which impedes over her. Denemark and Sweden, offended at the unlawful restraint imposed by her on their trade, in the arbitrary rule of contraband, have, for near three months past, united their forces in the name of peace; and therefore, the Austrians must be made acquainted with their wishes, and irritated with that Power, has, I have reason to believe, serious thoughts, not only of abandoning the war, but of acceding to this combination. The lapse of a few weeks, however, will, no doubt, unfold these subjects more fully to view.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

ParIs, November 1, 1794.

Sir:—I have been favored with yours of the 30th of July, original and duplicate, and had the pleasure to receive them unopened.

In my last letters, which were of the 15th September, and 18th October, I informed you of the several subjects which I had brought before the committee of public safety, as also of the ill success which had attended my efforts to obtain an answer upon any one; and I am sorry to be under the necessity now to add, that although I have presented these subjects to the committee several times, I have not been laid before it.

Being wearied with the delay, I notified to the committee, soon after the date of my last letter to you, that I should be glad to confer with them, or some few members, on the subject; provided it complied with their rules in such cases, and would otherwise be agreeable. The proposition was immediately assented to, and the evening of the same day appointed for the interview. I attended in their chamber; we had some discussion, and which ended in a request, on their part, that I would present in writing the sum of what I had said, or wished to say, either on the points depending, or any others I might find necessary to bring before them, and which I readily promised to do.

Vol. L
By this time I had obtained from Mr. Skipwith a comprehensive statement of the embarrassments attending our trade here; as well those which proceeded from the cruisers of the republic, and applied to what was destined or cleared out for foreign countries, as those which proceeded from the commercial system of France and applied to the direct commerce between the two republics. As his report to me specified not only each particular cause of confusion that existed, but also the way in which they might be removed, I determined to send him a second communication on that head. I accordingly laid it before the committee, with such comments as appeared to me suitable; and I now transmit to you a copy of it, that you may be apprized how fully the subject is before them. As to the chief opposition, which has been indicated to me, as arising from the difficulties of their own affairs, were long accumulating, and had probably attained a height of which they had no conception.

As I had reason to suspect that the chief opposition proceeded from those who conducted the public trade, and who were attached to that mode from motives not the most patriotic, I thought it proper to examine the question, whether the party were not in the moment of the emergency for the republic to encourage the competition of its markets, or depend on agencies employed in or sent to those countries for that purpose. This subject had been incidentally touched in my first note; but I thought some benefit might be derived from a more thorough development of it. With this view I sent in, at the same time, the paper, entitled "Supplemental Observations on the Commercial and Financial Relations of France and England in Consequence of the Conference." I felt extremely embarrassed how to touch again their infringement of the treaty of commerce; whether to call on them to execute it, or leave that question on the ground on which I had first placed it. You desired me in your last note to abstain from the premise, and to press to a conclusion the question of commerce. It now appeared to me that it would be advisable to demand of them the execution of those articles. Upon full consideration, therefore, I concluded that it was the most safe and sound policy to leave this point where it was before, and in which I was the more confirmed by some circumstances that were afterwards disclosed. I sent the last day after this last communication was received. I am now informed from the committee, assuring me that the subject engaged their entire attention, and that an answer should be given me as soon as possible; and a few days after this, I was favored with another, inviting me to a conference at twelve the next day. I attended and found only the three members of the diplomatic branch of the ministers, but Mr. Treilhard, by demanding that I had advised and pressed them to execute the 33d and 34th articles of the treaty of amity and commerce; that they were persuaded their compliance would be useful to us, but very detrimental to them: It would likewise be distressing for Frenchmen to see British goods protected by our flag, while their own goods were subject to the disadvantages of our envoys' duty; and I concluded that they would insist upon our executing the treaty? I replied nothing new to add to what I had already said on that head. Treilhard seemed surprised at the reply, and expressed a wish that I would declare myself frankly on the subject. I answered in my surprise, that I had not only declared myself frankly, but liberally. We then passed to the subject that I was about to mention, and after some short but satisfactory discussion, I pressed, which I urged, that if she considered her own interest only, she ought not to hesitate, since it gave her command of neutral bottoms, and, under the protection of their own flag, to supply her wants; with other considerations, which have been already stated. I was informed, before the conference, "Do you insist upon or demand it?" I found that a positive and formal declaration on this point was the sole object of the interview; and as I perceived that something was intended to be founded on it, either now or hereafter, if given in the affirmative, I was the more resolved to avoid it, and to adhere to the ground I had already taken. I therefore repeated my declaration, and in the most explicit terms, that I was not instructed by the President to insist on it, nor did I insist on it; that their compliance would certainly be highly beneficial to my country, but that in my observations I had considered the proposition merely in relation to France, and wished them to do the same, since I was satisfied that the true interest of France dictated the measure. They all expressed an attachment to the measure, and the difficulties of their own country prevented them from adopting it, but promised that, in the present state of the public mind, any measure which might be construed as eventually favoring England; and thus the conference ended.

To overcome the subject over since, I have been doubtful whether the sollicitude shown, to draw from me a decisive answer to the question "Whether I insisted or demanded of them to execute the articles of the treaty," was merely intended as the basis of their own act, complying with it, and a justification for themselves in so doing, or as a ground to call on us hereafter, in the prosecution of the war against England, to fulfill the guarantee. I was, at the moment of the discussion in the committee of the latter opinion, but I was convinced, upon a more general view of all circumstances that have passed under my observation since my arrival, that I am, at present, inclined to be of the former. I rather think, as there is an opposition to the measure, and it would come with an important change in their system, and might also be construed into a partiality for England, (a nation by no means in favor here,) it is necessary to meet the difficulty by an act of our own, stigmatizing their measures, which in the past I con- fided it would be impolitic to demand it; since the refusal would weaken the connexion between the two countries, and the compliance, upon that motive, might, perhaps, not only produce the same effect, but likewise excite a dispute between them. In these points, I am determined, whether such a measure is to be obtained, to obtain an answer, and a favorable one. If the subject was before the Convention in the light it stands before the committee, I am convinced it would long since have been the case. But it is difficult to get it there: for, if I carried it there myself, it would be deemed a kind of denunciation of the committee. Yesterday there was a change of several of the members of that body and which I deem, from my knowledge of those elected, favorable to our views. Be assured that I shall continue to press this business with all suitable energy, and in the mode that shall appear to me most eligible; and, in the interim, that I will do every thing in my power to prevent abuses under the existing system.

The sum of the fifteen thousand dollars advanced for the emigrants from St. Domingo, I have made no formal demand, because I wished the other points, which were depending, settled first, from an apprehension that, if they granted several little matters, it would fortify them in a disposition to reject those that were important. I have, however, repeatedly urged them on this point, and they have not declined making this a subject for the consideration of a board to be calculated on by the Department of the Treasury. I shall certainly bring it before them shortly, as I shall immediately the affair of the consul in the Isle of France upon which latter point, however, permit me respectfully to add that the appointment of a person not an American, perhaps an Englishman, to the office of consul, has not only been a subject of complaint and disrespect to our authority, but every thing in the way of propriety, and I must say the reward was exposed there.

With respect to the business with Algiers, I have not known how to act. It will be difficult for France, in the present state of affairs, to support the measures of our resident in Portugal, or for them to concert any plan of co-operation. It seems, however, in every view, proper to rid ourselves of the person in Switzerland, who, I understand, has been in readiness to prosecute the business for some time past. I have, in consequence, written him a letter, in conformity to your idea, of which I enclose you a copy, and which, I presume, he will consider as a request to me. You will perceive the manner in which I have addressed this measure to the Committee of Consular affairs, and the course that may be adopted by which she may forward the measure of Colonel Humphreys, I will endeavor to avail of him of it. But, certainly, if it is expected that her aid will be efficacious, or that she will embark with zeal in the business, the whole should be concerted and executed by this quarter, and that it be not left to a Mr. Skipwith, who has been here, to show you what has been done; he is pursuing it without calculating upon any aid from France. A letter which was presented me by Mr. Cathalan, our consul at Marseilles, (and who is now here, as are Mr. Fenwick, Dobree, and Coffyn, a son of Mr. Coffyn, consul, and who came here to represent his father) from Captain O'Brien, and was delivered to me some days ago, do not, however, show you what has been done in Algiers. I am informed that Mr. Skipwith was ordered under my country any service, in this distressing business, in my power, even by visiting Algiers, if it were necessary. I have inquired into the character of our consuls at the several ports: I mean those who are Frenchmen: for Mr. Fenwick is well known: viz. La Motte, at Havre; Dobree, at Nantes; Coffyn, at Dunkirk; and Cathalan, at Mar- seilles; and find them all men of understanding, attached to our reputation, located to our country, and grateful for the confidence reposed in them. If displaced, it will subject them to some censure: I do not, therefore, wish it; though I most earnestly advise that, in future, none but Americans be appointed.

I was extremely concerned, upon my arrival here, to find that our countryman, Mr. Paine, as likewise Madame Lafayette, were in prison; the former of whom had been confined near nine months, and the latter about two. I was immediately, and without being personally acquainted with, or in any manner interested in her, tried, and finally arrested, by both to endeavors to obtain their enlargement. I assured them of the interest which America had in their deliverance; and promised them by the underwritten statement, that I should endeavor every opportunity to serve them; but observed, at the same time, that they must be sensible it would be difficult for me to take any step officially in behalf of either, and altogether impossible in behalf of Madame Lafayette. This was answered by her friend, who assured me her only wish was that I would have her situation in view, and render her, informally, what services I might be able, without compounding the credit of others with her interest. I assured him she might confide in this with certainty, and, further, that, in case any extremity was threatened, that I would go beyond that line, and do everything in my power, let the consequence be what it might to myself, to save her: with this she was satisfied. She still continues confined, nor do I think it probable she will soon be released. I have assured her that I would supply her with money and with whatever she wanted; but, as yet, none has been accepted, though I think she will soon be compelled to avail herself of this resource.

The case was different with Mr. Paine. He was actually a citizen of the United States, and of the United States only: for the Revolution which parted us from Great Britain, broke the allegiance which was before due to the crown, of all those who took our side. He was, of course, not a British subject, nor was he strictly a citizen of France: for he came, by invitation, for the temporary purpose of assisting in the formation of their Government only. Hence, in such a case, I should think it would be the interest of the Convention itself arresting him, by which he is declared to be a foreigner. Mr. Paine pressed my interference. I told him I had hopes of getting him enlarged without it, but, if I did interfere, it could only be by requesting that he be tried, in case there was any charge against him, and liberated, in case there was none. This was admitted.

His correspondence with me is lengthy and interesting, and I may probably be able hereafter to send you a copy of it. After some time had elapsed, without producing any change in his favor, as he was pressing and in ill health, I finally resolved to address the committee of general security in his behalf, resting my application on the above principle. I had written to the committee, to the president, who assured him he would communicate its contents immediately to the committee of public safety, and give me an answer as soon as possible.

The conference took place accordingly between the two committees, and, as I presume, on that night, or the succeeding day; for, on the morning of the day after, which was yesterday, I was presented by the secretary of the committee of general security, with an order for his enlargement. I forwarded it immediately to the Luxembourg, and had it carried into effect, and have the pleasure now to add that he is not only restored to the enjoyment of his liberty, but in good spirits. I send you a copy of my letter to the committee of general security, and of their reply.

Since my last, the French have taken Coblenz, and some other post in its neighborhood; they have likewise taken Pamplona, and broken the whole of the Spanish line through a considerable extent of country. About twenty standards taken from the routed Spaniards were presented to the Convention a few days past.

I likewise send, in the enclosed papers, a decree respecting the Jacobins, by which all correspondence between the different societies is prohibited, as likewise is the presenting a petition to the Convention in their character as such, with some other restraints I do not at present recollect.

From Mr. Monroe to the Committee of Public Safety.
PARIS, October 18th, 1791.

Upon the several subjects on which I addressed you on the 17th Fructidor, (September 3d) viz: the embargo of Bordeaux; the supplies rendered to the Government of St. Domingo; and the departure by France from the 23d and 24th articles of the treaty of amity and commerce subsisting between the two republics, I have but little to add at present. The two former matters are of great importance, and could not be completely adjusted, by any means short of a convention between the committee and myself. That only to ask for such despatch in the adjustment and payment as the exigence of the parties and the circumstances of the republic would admit of. Nor shall I add any thing upon the third point to change the principle upon which both of the committee will, therefore, be pleased to decide upon each under the considerations which have been already urged.

I likewise stated in that note, generally, the embarrassment under which our commerce labored in the ports of the republic. A general view was all I could then give. But the appointment of a censeil for this city has since enabled me to examine into the statement made. This I had immediately examined it with great attention, and reported the result to me, a copy of which I now lay before you. It presents to view a frightful picture of difficulties and losses, equally injurious to both countries, and which, if suffered to continue, will unavoidably interrupt, for the time, the commercial intercourse between them. I trust, therefore, the causes will be immediately removed, and such remeses adopted, and in this I am the more confident, because those which would be deemed adequate will, in any degree, interfere with the internal police or regulations of the country.

I also suggested in my former note that, however necessary it might be for France to avail herself of agents in America at the present crisis, for the purchase and shipment of supplies thence, here it should not be relied on as a principal resource. The more attention I have since paid to this subject, the better satisfied I have become of the justicce of that remark. I have, therefore, thought it my duty to add some further observations on it, and which I now beg leave to submit to your consideration in the annexed paper.

You will observe the counsel has likewise consisted in his report the cases of many seamen and other persons, citizens of the United States, taken at sea or elsewhere, and who are now held as prisoners in confinement. I hope an order will be issued for their immediate enlargement; and, as it is possible many others may be in like situation, that it may be made to comprehend all the citizens of the United States, not charged with any criminal offense against the laws of France, and of which latter description I hope there are none. The committee will, I doubt not, designate such species of evidence necessary to establish the right of citizenship in doubtful cases, as it will be practicable for the parties to furnish.

I also take this early decision upon these subjects, that I may immediately communicate it to our Government. The Congress will commence its session in a few weeks, and it is the duty of the President to lay before that body, and at that time, the state of public affairs, comprising, as the most interesting particular, the conduct and disposition of other nations towards the United States. Information upon these points will, of course, be expected from me, and I should be mortified not to be able to give such as would be deemed satisfactory.

JAMES MONROE.

Supplemental Observations to the note of the 3d of September, upon the American Commerce.

That France will have occasion, whatever may be the crop for the present year, for supplies of provision from foreign countries for the next, is certain. These must be obtained from the neutral countries, and especially from the United States of America. It is important for her to ascertain how they shall be obtained, and brought into her ports with greatest certainty and least expense.
There are but two possible ways or modes by which these supplies, or any others, can be brought here, which are: first, by public exertion, or by agents in those countries, whose duty it is to purchase the articles in demand, and send them here on public account: and secondly, by the enterprise of individuals. Both shall be impartially examined.

First, as to the certainty; and which will depend upon prompt purchases, safe carriage, and integrity of the agents.

As soon as agents arrive in America, it will be known to the commercial interest in every quarter. Whenever they appoint sub-agents, this will likewise be known. When it is intended to make purchases and shipments, this will be known. The movement of vessels to take in cargoes, will be observed. Immediately a combination will be formed by the owners and managers of the vessels, who will bring all the disposal of them to the competition of the market, and this will raise the price and create delay. A monopoly naturally revolts the society against it, and this will add a new stimulus to the otherwise sufficiently active one of private interest, to speculate and prey upon the agents, and, of course, upon the embarrassments of the public.

But the purchase is finally made and shipped for France; the ships are at sea, the property belongs to France; and the ships, though American, give no protection by the ancient law of nations, which is in force where not otherwise regulated by treaty, and of course with England. The cargo of every vessel shall be taken will be condescendingly sold by the state, and examined by a committee of the United States, and it will be employed to counteract in the purchase and upon the sea. It will be applieable from the ports whence shipments were made, and have vessels of war stationed to seize them.

It is the nature of an agency to depend upon the policy of supply. The whole amount of its profits will depend upon the exclusion of every other: for every cargo which shall arrive from another source, will take from it so much. It will, therefore, see with jealous the commencement of enterprises of this kind, and deem each in the degree a robbery of its own resources. It will fear that not only the amount of its profits will be diminished, but that the funds upon which they are to be made, will be exhausted. It will, therefore, discourage these enterprises, by hinting that the republic does not want them: that it has no money to pay for them; that the captains and supercargoes are ill treated in France by delay, &c. It will be the interest of the agency to crush every other mode of supply, and it will accomplish it, unless the wisest precautions are used to prevent it.

Besides, funds must be raised somewhere, to a sufficient amount to supply it. The agency disposed to discharge the trust faithfully as it could, making, at the same time, the greatest profit for itself, and which would generally be done. But let it be supposed that it was cabal of defrauding the public as much as possible, without being detected. In this case, additional difficulties arise, for it will be impossible to devise contrivances to secure its success in the market, and bid one against the other, they would keep the price at its proper level, and thus check its conduct for if it charged more than they (allowing for the difference of the commission) it would of course be convicted of fraud; and, if capable of fraud, other and numerous temptations to seduction might be counted. The chief agent would in this case be the British administration. Suppose the French government to have an immense supply of a national resource. The withholding it might bring on a crisis in her affairs, and which might terminate in an arrangement that would applaud the agent for his prudence. Would he be not an object for the British administration to assualt? And would it be proper that France and the French revolution should be thus made dependent on agents in foreign countries?

As to the comparative expense, there can be no question upon that point. The commission itself will be a considerable thing, in addition to which the freight will be increased: for if American vessels are employed, the owners will exert every thing in their power to increase the freight. If the ship owns the agency shall procure, it is on the charg of the ship, and they will not to the increased price which would be demanded by the agents, in consequence of the combination among the merchants to take advantage of circumstances which would be known to them; nor to suggest that, under any probable modification, it would be the interest of the agents to give the highest price possible.

The operation of the system is so plain and obvious that there can be no possibility of any error.

In Paris, Hamburg, or some other neutral town? The former, as heretofore, will probably be in a great measure declined; and if the latter is adopted, how will they be raised there? By the exportation of the productions or other commodities of the country; incurrying thereby the expense of double commissions, storage, the hazard of the sea, and the expense together with the further inconvenience of overstocking the market, and raising, at the same time, such town to grandeur, by making it the entrepot of French provisions, whilst her own were impoverished.

Every thing that has been said, or can be said, against a chief dependence on agencies, forms an argument in favor of encouraging the ordinary private trade by individuals, and shows that the supply by that mode might be made more sure and cheap. If France would regulate things so that the parties bringing provisions into her ports were paid immediately and despatched, she might command, if necessary, the whole produce of America. Nor would it be necessary that the payment be always in specie. On the contrary, return cargoes would more frequently be paid in the form of manufactures, either domestic or prize goods.

The above is a short sketch of the conveniences and inconveniences which attend the two modes of supply. The one which comes in a monopoly will be attended with all the inconveniences which belong to monopolies in general, and which may be so digested as to be entirely effectual. The other monopolies of foreign trade are confined to luxuries of little importance, and of countries whose citizens cannot send them to market; whereas, the present one is a monopoly of the necessities of life in great demand here, to be obtained from countries whose citizens can best supply them, and at a crisis of affairs when the failure may hazard every thing valuable to France; and when of course it should be most avoided. Whilst, on the other hand, the latter, which is a system of free trade, will not only be free from these objections, but enjoy some benefits which are peculiar to it. It will leave commerce in the hands of individuals, and under the protection of the flags of both countries. If it was made known that France would protect the neutral commerce, the merchants would have a new encouragement to enterprise, and the neutral Powers would be more decisive in vindicating their own rights. The French flag would be the emblem of trade, and the assessor of the freedom of the seas. The American merchant would behold it with pleasure, because they would find under its banner not only the friendly welcome of their ally, but the like and safety from the picquencies of the ocean. If the demand by France was great, it would be known in the United States, whose merchants would immediately supply the demand. And if it was interrupted on the sea by the vessels of another Power, what would be the obvious effect of such an interruption? Might not France oppose it, and conduct the vessels safe to her ports, and would it not raise the nation injured to vindicate its rights, and protect its own commerce.

Unhappily, France has adopted a different policy towards us, heretofore. Instead of encouraging individuals to supply her market, she has given them every possible discouragement which could be devised. Instead of protecting the commerce at sea, and leaving us seek separation for the injuries which were rendered us by other Powers, she has rendered us like injuries, and thus embarrased our councils. But it is not too late to change this system of policy. The Americans have lamented it not more on their own account than that of France. It has, as yet, left no unkind impression behind it; and if the necessary regulations are made, commerce will soon resume its ordinary course.

I do not, by this, object to the plan of supplying by agency altogether. On the contrary, I deem it necessary; because I think it proper for France to avail herself at the present crisis of every resource within her reach. I only wish that it be not relied on as the sole one, and which it will certainly be, if the necessary measures be not immediately adopted to encourage the ordinary private trade, and to restrict agency will be guard against any misconduct in the agency abroad.
The Committee of Public Safety to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

PARIS, 30th September (October 21st, 1794.)

3d year of the republic.

We have received your letter of the 27th of this month, with the pieces annexed. We have felt the weight of their number, and our attention. We have hasten to examine the complaints which are therein exposed, and we hope that the result of our deliberations will be as satisfactory to your fellow-citizens, as conformable to the principles of fraternity and attachment which have always guided the measures of the Government of the French republic towards its good and faithful allies, the United States of America.

MERLIN. RICHARD. TREILLARD. DELMAS.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, November 20th, 1794.

Sir,

I was favored about five weeks past with a letter from Mr. Gardou, Minister of Finance in Spain, enclosing one for Mr. Otto, formerly in America, and at present chief of a bureau in the Department of Foreign Affairs, mentioning the decline of his health, and requesting my co-operation with Mr. Otto, in soliciting of this Government permission to return. They merit our best attention. I was too far advanced for him to derive any benefit from the waters, and I was not apprised that those suggested were better than others within his reach. Besides, Mr. Gardou and myself were, in consequence of a collision on the much litigated question of the Mississippi, not on the best terms while in America; certainly not on such as to authorize an application of this kind to me.

I immediately inferred that it was the body politic of Spain that was disordered, and not the animal one of Mr. Gardou. As I did not wish to become the instrument of Spain in this business, or incur the slightest suspicion of the tone I have assumed to the United States. I declined giving his letter to Mr. Otto, or answering, for the time, that of Mr. Gardou to me. About three weeks afterwards, I received a second letter, which confirmed me in the opinion first taken up, that the object was to open the door, through me, to the commencement of a negotiation for peace. I found, therefore, that it became my duty to take some step in regard to the United States, and to communicate my course of action in such manner as to make the incident, if possible, productive of some good to the United States, if not to none of Spain.

When I reflected that we had interfering claims with Spain, as well in respect to the boundaries as the Mississippi, and that the latter, were not only without the means that the neutral mission was possessed of without a satisfactory adjustment, and that Spain was probably in concert with England, exciting the Indians against us, I said to myself these considerations, inclined to deem this movement of Mr. Gardou an insolent one. I was the more so from the further consideration that he had made this application to me without the knowledge of Mr. Short, through whom his mission was to be conducted.

I was, therefore, more resolved to suffer myself to be restrained by no unnecessary and false motives of delicacy towards Mr. Gardou, in the manner in which I should treat the subject.

I was likewise persuaded it was the interest of France to have our accommodation in view, and to give her aid in forwarding our arrangement with Spain, at the same time that she adjusted her own: for if she should close a peace with that Power, whereby she left it at liberty to act against us singly, or jointly with England, in case of a war, she would render it more difficult to make a respectable opposition to any effort we might make on the other side of the Atlantic, but an alliance with France would remove such pressure, and leave the Spanish Government at liberty to act with its whole force against us.

I was likewise persuaded it was the interest of France to have our accommodation in view, and to give her aid in forwarding our arrangement with Spain, at the same time that she adjusted her own: for if she should close a peace with that Power, whereby she left it at liberty to act against us singly, or jointly with England, in case of a war, she would render it more difficult to make a respectable opposition to any effort we might make on the other side of the Atlantic, but an alliance with France would remove such pressure, and leave the Spanish Government at liberty to act with its whole force against us.

Upon full consideration of all these circumstances, I thought it best to lay the letters of Mr. Gardou before the committee, with my free comments upon them. I did so, and told them explicitly that, in my opinion, it was the wish of the Spanish court to commence the moment, and that it had addressed itself through me, to inspire a distrust in me, by creating a belief that the United States were more friendly to Spain than to France. I explained fully our situation with both those Powers, assuring them that we were inured with a war from both. I also mentioned the indiscreet and artifice of Mr. Gardou, in applying to me without the knowledge of our committee, that our two great friend countries might exist in peace. I assured them, at the same time, that I could be of no service in forwarding their wishes in regard to peace, in the present or any other instance, it was the wish of the United States I should be, and would personally give me great satisfaction. I informed also the danger which would attend a peace between the republic and Spain, unless our differences should be compromised at the same time. I communicated the whole received, and the business terminated in an arrangement, by which I was to answer Mr. Gardou's letters, declining any agency in the business myself, advising him, at the same time, to make his application directly (in case he continued indisposed) to the committee, and from whom I was persuaded he would obtain a satisfactory answer. This was accordingly done in a letter which was forwarded about five days past.

In the close of this affair, I was invited by the diplomatic members of the committee of public safety to a conference upon a new point, which was the intention to send the United States to France in our present war with England, but particular, but that they were distressed for funds, and was asked, could any aid be obtained from the British minister, whom they were satisfied, if it was in their power, it would be rendered; that I possessed no power on the subject, and could only advise of the probability, &c.; that, with their permission, I would put on paper such ideas as occurred to me in respect to that point, and upon which I would afterwards more fully confer. This incident furnished me with a new opportunity of pressing more forcibly the propriety of their securing for us the points in discussion with England and Spain, at their time their own peace should be made with those Powers. I send you a copy of the paper drawn up in consequence of this conference.

Whether France will make any arrangement upon this point with us I cannot tell. When I mentioned, in the committee, the danger which menaced us of a war with Britain and Spain, and asked what reliance we might have on France in such event, I was answered, they should consider ours as their own cause. No other arrangement can well be to have been made here by France, if it be true, that she will so secure, at the time of her own peace, the complete recognition of our rights from Britain and Spain, and which she may easily do, in my judgment, and without prolonging the war a moment on that account.

According to the United States every mean to assert those rights, the present is, of all others, the most suitable moment. The fortune of France has risen to the utmost height of splendor, whilst that of her enemies, declined to the lowest state of depression. Her armies are everywhere triumphant, whilst theirs are everywhere routed and broken. Spain makes no head against her, but is trying, as already shown, to steal a peace in obscurity. And Britain is, perhaps, in nearly as bad a situation. Mauritius has lately surrendered, whereas eight thousand troops were yielded, with about three hundred pieces of cannon, two hundred and fifty-seven of them in brass, with other warlike stores, and in great abundance. Nimeguen was likewise taken a few days afterwards, with considerable amount in stores; and, it is said, that commodities are taking place in five of the provinces, who have formally resolved to dismiss the Stadtholder, reform the Government by the republican standard, and ally with France. This must be felt in England, and will probably excite disturbance there. In any event it will produce such effect as will strike the blow her own interest dictates, and which every other consideration prompts; it must be decisive, and, if not ruinous to the fortunes of that proud and insolent nation, will certainly secure us the objects we have in view.

If I should get the committee about the proposition for a loan, &c. I will advise you of it by the French minister, who leaves this in about five days. By the paper which I send, you will understand how far the point has been discussed, of the propriety in France to support our claims against Britain and Spain; the opportunity for which was furnished by my friend Mr. Gardoqui, and you will soon be able to ascertain from the minister what his powers on that head are.

Within a few days past, two deputies were appointed by the committee of public safety, by consent of the Convention, to some important trust, but whose names and office are unknown. It is supposed they are commissioned to treat on peace with one of the Powers, and which is most probable but with which of the Powers, or whether this is the object, or any matter connected with it. I apprized you in a late letter, that I had written to Colonel Humphreys, and was endeavoring to concert with him, it possible, the mode by which the aid of this Government, if disposed to grant it, (and which I presume to be the case) may be given him in the negotiation with Algiers. As from him, as soon as I do, provided I find it necessary, I will apply for the support contemplated. Previous to this, it will be improper. Touching this subject, I send you a proposition from the Government of Malta, presented by its chargé des affaires here, to be forwarded for your consideration. You will give me, for that Government, such answer as shall be deemed suitable.

Within a few days past, the hall of the Jacobins was shut up, by order of the Convention. That body was constantly at work to undermine and impair the regular and constituted authority of the Government. Moderate measures to check its enormities were found only to add to its greater excesses. This last step was, therefore, taken, and there is reason to fear its dispersed members will still continue to provoke, by some rash measure, the indignation of the Convention to such a height, as to bring upon them a degree of severity, it were better to avoid. Within a few days past also, the commission, to whom was referred the charge against Carriere, formerly representative at Nantes, has reported there was ground for accusation, and to-day, it is believed, the convention will approve the report, and consign him over to the revolutionary tribunal, who will, with equal certainty, and with the general plaudit of the nation, doom him to the guillotine.

From Mr. Monroe to the Committee of Public Safety.

PARIS, November 13, 1794.

I received, some weeks past, a letter from Mr. Gardoqui, Minister of the Spanish Finances, enclosing one to my care for Mr. Otto, then in the Department of Foreign Affairs, requesting me to present it to him. As I did not wish to be the channel of communication from Mr. Gardoqui or any citizen of France, whatever might be his object, and whether of a private or public nature, I resolved neither to deliver the letter, nor give an answer, for the time, to that which was addressed to me. And I was the more inclined to this from the persuasion that, if of a private nature, the delay could be of no great importance, and, if of a public one, and especially upon an interesting subject, that when it was found I attended only to the concerns of my own country, and did not choose to interfere in those of Spain, that he would take some course more direct for the attainment of the object in view. As some weeks had now elapsed, I took it for granted that this was the case. In this, however, I have been disappointed: for I was favored, within a few days past, with a letter from Mr. Gardoqui, to which he enters more fully in the first communication. Finding, therefore, that he still addressed himself to me, notwithstanding the discouragement already given, I deemed it necessary, not only to examine more attentively the object of this communication, but likewise to adopt, definitively, some plan in regard to it. Nor had I much difficulty in either respect: for, when I recollected that he was a minister of Spain, and observed that his letters, as well as to Mr. Otto, and which I have since examined, as those to me, expressed only a wish to be admitted within the Government of France to attend some baths, I could not but conclude that this was the ostensible motive, whilst some other, in reality, existed. And in this I am more confirmed from a recollection of the relation in which Mr. Gardoqui and myself formerly stood, to each other, in which the friendship which then existed, and his present position for encroaching the Mississippi, was not the most amicable one. From that consideration, I do not think he would solicit a correspondence with me for a trilling object. What other reason then must be the motive? In my judgment, there can be none other than the hope of thereby opening the door for the commencement of a negotiation for peace, and that the Spanish court has availed itself of this mode of making that wish known to you.

Presuming, then, that this was in truth the object, it remained for me only to decide what course I should take in regard to Mr. Gardoqui's communications; nor could I hesitate long upon this point; for I well knew it was of importance to you to become acquainted with the disposition of other Powers towards the French republic. I have, therefore, deemed it consistent with that sincere friendship which the United States bear towards you, and the interest they take as your ally, in whatever concerns your welfare, as well as with that candor I mean to observe in all my transactions, to lay the letters before you; knowing their contents, you will be enabled to determine how to act in regard to them. As it respects the United States, whom I serve, or myself personally, it can be of no importance to me to be acquainted with the result; since I doubt not, that, under the wise counsels of the republic, the revolution will progress to a happy close; but permit me to assure you that, if I can be of any service to the French republic, in regard to the answer to be given to this communication, it will give me the highest satisfaction to render it.

Observations submitted by Mr. Monroe to the consideration of the Diplomatic Members of the Committee of Public Safety.

It is the wish of the French republic to obtain, by loan, a sum of money from the United States of America, to enable it to prosecute the war. This is to be expected from three sources: the General Government, the State Governments, and from individuals. The French cause and the French nation are greatly regarded in America, and I am persuaded some money may be obtained, and perhaps a very respectable sum, from the three sources above mentioned. For this purpose the matter is of so great importance, that it is necessary for the Government and the State to have power to make loans from either of the above parties, and to give such security as the republican shall deem suitable.

The committee, however, should advert to the situation of the United States in regard to England and Spain. Both nations have encroached upon our rights; the one by taking the British posts, in violation of the treaty of peace of 1783, whereby she harasses our frontier, by means of the Indians and the other, by shutting the Mississipi, and likewise exciting the Indians against us to the south; so that the United States are in a kind of hostility with both Powers. There is likewise reason to believe that a convention subsists between Britain and Spain, defensive and probably offensive, against us, in support of their respective claims.

In this situation, would it be proper for France to make peace with either of those Powers, whilst our claims were unsettled with either, and whilst both encroach on our territory? Would it not leave those Powers free to attack us united, and, in that situation, would not France be forced again to embark in the war, or tamely look on and see our dismemberment? Could the republic, in short, deem its own peace secure or durable whilst these points remained unsettled? I shall only mention the subjects which have arisen between the United States and those Powers, and should it not, therefore, seek an adjustment of the whole at the same time?

I have suggested these considerations in the hope that the committee will give the minister, about to depart for America, full power in relation thereto, and in the confidence that a satisfactory assurance on that head would enable the United States to carry the difference between them and the other Powers, which is, that the difference between the United States and those Powers, it would, of course, be more in their power to lend them to the French republic.

It must be obvious that France may not only secure these points for us, and without any difficulty, but with Spain, which she pleased; for I am persuaded that the Spanish monarchy would even agree to open the islands to the world, and perhaps even to South America, to end a war which endangers the crown itself.

The mode would be by insinuating to both these Powers, when France commenced her negotiation, that they must avoid, at the same time, their difference with the United States.

The sum which might be raised in America from the different sources above mentioned, upon an assurance of this kind, would, in my judgment, be considerable. In any event, however, I shall be happy to give the minister about to depart every information and aid in my power, in forwarding the object in view.

I am, therefore, however, whether it would not be proper to enable me, in my letters on that subject, to declare what your sense is upon these points.

From Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, December 3d, 1794.

Sir:—I have at length obtained an answer from the committee of public safety, to several propositions heretofore presented before it, in an arrête of the 18th ultimo, and which I now transmit to you. By this arrête the committee have decided, that the amount of such of our citizens as were injured by the embargo of Bordeaux, and likewise to such others as have claims for supplies rendered to the Government of St. Domingo. By it, also, many embarrassments which impeded the direct trade between the two countries are removed. The arrête further provided that, with our vessels, which had been blockade by the two countries, is done away; and the stipulation of the treaty of commerce, which gives free passage under our flag to the subjects of any of the Powers at war with the republic, is likewise enforced. In short, every thing has been conceded that was desired, except the execution of that part of the treaty which gave freedom to goods in ships that were have, in consequence, notified to the commission of marine, that I had empowered Mr. Skipwith to take charge of these claims, and attend their adjustment on the part of our citizens, and I shall continue to give every assistance in my power, as soon as they are entitled. In respect to the liquidation, unless, indeed, some difficulty should arise, as to the mode of payment, whether in assignats or specie, I presume all such is at an end. But in regard to the payment, I think it probable, unless assignats are taken, and which are now depreciated, further delay will be desired, owing to the great expenditures of the Government at this very improper and unprofitable time, in which the unfortunate, and unshrinkingly, I think, would be given. If the treaty could have been carried into effect by general agreement, I should have deemed it a fortunate thing; because it would have secured our commerce hereafter from the possibility of vexation, and upon any pretext whatever, by the French cruisers; and because it would have ranged the French republic, at an important period of its affairs, on the side of a principle founded in benevolence, and necessary to the freedom of the high seas. But as connected with other considerations more immediately applicable to ourselves, and especially, if the hope of forcing it upon other nations, as a law, is abandoned, I have deemed it of but little consequence. It certainly precludes the probability of our being called on hereafter to fulfil any stipulation whatever, and will, of course, gain us greater credit for any services we may render them, in case it should suit us to render them any. I am likewise persuaded, from the responsibility the arrête imposes, and the increasing partiality pervading all France towards us, and which is felt by the Americans, and observed by the subjects of other neutral Powers, that the latter would naturally follow the treaty itself; and I think that many of our vessels will hereafter be brought in upon the suspicion of having enemies' goods on board.

I informed you some time since, that I was persuaded, if the subject was before the Convention, it would readily be granted; and in this I have now only been confirmed, but, in the further belief, that a majority of the several States have been in a condition to consider the subject. To distrust the motion, or to increase the profit of others, would be to the two parties to receive a benefit by their own inactivity. I have, therefore, urged the Senate, or any Committee, to take the matter into their view, as soon as the benefits of the treaty shall, I hope, be sanctioned by the Senate, and by the convention.

Your letters, of the 20th ultimo, with respect to the qualifications of political offices, and the same time lessen any weight the United States might have upon that subject, in respect to their own affairs, by inspiring a distrust in me on the part of the people. I shall have to state to you in what manner I had acted upon that occasion, laying his original letters before the committee, with my free and candid comments upon them; as also the further discussion which took place between the committee and myself, with regard to Spain, and in which an incident of a different kind, and much more important, I was exposed, as far as the nature of the case would admit of, the real situation of the United States with respect to Spain and Britain, menaced with war by both; showing how France would be affected by that event, and of course, the consequences it would have upon the business of the last moment. To that communication, I have now nothing new to add, having since the 1st of January, when the Government of Mr. Gardoqui's letter was written, and the different offices that the one or the other which afterwards occurred. I omitted, however, at that time, to transmit to you a copy of my letter accompanying Mr. Gardoqui's to the committee, and which I now enclose for the purpose of presenting that business more fully to your information.

I am convinced that this exposition of our situation with Britain and Spain, and to which the incident of Mr. Gardoqui furnished the first opening, has been useful; for before that exposition, I had reason to believe, that it was not only unknown, but that a very erroneous opinion was entertained by many, in the committee, upon that subject. I thought I had felt the effect of that opinion, created no doubt in the manner you suggest; but as it was not communicated in a way to enable me to take official notice of it, I was embarrassed how to act, or what measure to adopt in regard to it. For awhile, as it was circulated only in private, I thought it best to counteract it by making the necessary explanation only to those who mentioned it to me. Finally, as I knew the campaign to be progressing towards a close, and that the winter was the season for negotiation; and more especially, as I feared its consequences in a misunderstanding with either of those Powers, with such improper opinion of our situation with each, because I well knew they would improve it with great dexterity to their advantage, I deemed it my duty to make an extraordinary effort to break it. I approached the commissioners of both nations, and which took place accordingly. I was resolved, however, not to meet the imputation as a charge supported by an example, or which I was bound to answer, in case it did. A denial of a charge might begat a suspicion where there was none. I took different ground, by informing the committee that the war in which they were engaged, like all other wars, must have its close. That more especially was the case, as they were continually convinced the United States would be happy to render the French republic any service in their power, in that respect, to bring the present war to a happy close: That it was not their interest to interfere, even by mediation, nor, in my judgment, would they, otherwise than at the instance and by the request of the French republic, in the hope of being free from suspicion, as the obstacles to the accomplishment of that object, were only given the information, that they might retain it in memory for the purpose of availing themselves of it hereafter, in case it should be found expedient. It was received respectfully, but calmly. By one of the members it was observed, that the proposition was too generous for them to pursue. It was not to ask any Power upon the subject of peace, but presumed the success of their armies had disposed them all well towards it; and thus I left them to reflect at leisure upon what I had said, in the belief, however, that the communication must produce a good effect. As this took place prior to the affair of Mr. Gardoqui, and which was more particularly made to Oriental statesmen, it may be suspected that you may be possessed of every, the minutest circumstance relative to our affairs upon this very important theatre.

If the subject of a loan is mentioned again here, or in America, that of securing for us the points in question must likewise have been spoken of, and every weight of desire that the Austrian minister had, that the anxious to revive it here. I am, however, persuaded it will be revived with you: for so vast are their armies, and extensive their operations, that they must be distressed for money, and forced to gain it from whence they can. And sincerely wish we may assist them, if possible, and which I presume it will be, especially if not comprised in the war, and which I think cannot be, although we should be as anxious, as the United States and Spain the rights they have usurped from us. The credit of the United States is such in Europe and America, and their means of reinforcement so unquestionable, especially in the particular of the Western territory (an object viewed with a great efficacy upon this side of the Atlantic) that I am persuaded the amount expected might be obtained by loan; and I am, therefore, sure, in the longer or shorter, that the present minister of France will take the necessary steps to bring it to the best advantage.

The subject of a loan was then again taken up. The agents of the United States, in their comments on the explanation of Mr. Gardoqui, and told them I had received a dispatch from you since our last conference, and that our dilemma with those two Powers was even more critical than I had before intimated. Facts of this kind go further in removing doubts, than any assurances I could otherwise give them. These discussions have enabled me to examine attentively whether it was their real wish that we should embark with them in the war, and I can now, without fear, affirm, that if I were to present myself to them in person, that their wish is not to engage any other Power upon the subject of peace, but presumed the success of their armies had disposed them all well towards it; and thus I left them to reflect at leisure upon what I had said, in the belief, however, that the communication must produce a good effect. As this took place prior to the affair of Mr. Gardoqui, and which was more particularly made to Oriental statesmen, it may be suspected that you may be possessed of every, the minutest circumstance relative to our affairs upon this very important theatre.
I promised you, some time since, my comments upon the subject of a consular arrangement for the ports of this republic. The consuls have been here to confer with me upon the subject of trade, and I have obtained from them their ideas on that arrangement which I now ensole you. I will add my own comments on it in my next, and will subjoin the names of some Americans now here, that may be deemed worthy your attention. I think proper, however, now to mention, that Mr. Shipwith will accept the office of consul for this city, and that I think him worthy of it. He is, in my opinion, a sensible man, of strict integrity, and well acquainted with the duties of the office. The duties of consul here will be those of consul general, and, in strictness, the commission should be correspondent. They may, however, be performed under that of consul only: for I presume those in the ports will respect him equally in either character.

From the Commission of Foreign Relations to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

PARIS, 3d Frimaire, 3d year of the republic, (November 9th, 1794.)

You will find within, citizen minister, the copy of an arrêté, taken on the 25th Brumaire last, (19th November) by the committee of public safety, relative to the conduct which shall hereafter be observed in the ports, and by the vessels of the republic, towards neutral vessels and their cargoes. This arrêté furnishes an answer to the memoir which you presented on the 17th of Fructidor (September 6th.) You will doubtless be fully satisfied with the dispositions which are there announced. You will consider them as a new proof of the desire of our Government to maintain and strengthen the good intelligence which now so happily reigns between our two republics.

Miot.

Extract of the Register of Arrêts of the Committees of Public Safety, Finance, and Supplies, 25th Brumaire, (November 18, 1794) 3d year of the republic.

The Committees of Public Safety, Commerce, and Supplies, order as follows:

ARTICLE I. The vessels of the United States of America, and those of other neutral Powers, shall be permitted to enter freely into the ports of the republic, and retire from them when they please: nor shall it be permitted to any neutral Power to close to them the liberty to return to their departure, or to oblige the captains to sell their cargoes against their will.

ARTICLE II. When the captains or owners of neutral vessels are disposed to sell their cargoes to the public, they shall be paid for them according to the bargain which they make.

ARTICLE III. It is enjoined to all the commandants of naval armaments, fleets, divisions, and squadrons, of the republic, to respect, and cause to be respected, upon their responsibility, in favor of the neutral and allied Powers, the rights of nations and the stipulations of treaties, conforming themselves strictly to the terms of the decree of the Convention of the 27th of July, 1792.

ARTICLE IV. In consequence thereof, they are expressly prohibited from turning these vessels from their course; taking from the board of them their captains, sailors, or passengers, other than soldiers or sailors actually in the service of an enemy Power; or of seizing the effects or merchandise which shall be found in them.

ARTICLE V. Are excepted from the prohibition contained in the preceding article—

1. Merchandises belonging to the enemies of the republic, until such enemy Powers shall have declared that the merchandises of the French shall be permitted on the same footing.
2. Such merchandises of the neutral Powers also as are deemed contraband of war; and under which are comprised all arms, instruments, and munitions of war, and every kind of merchandise and other effects destined for an enemy's port, actually seized or blockaded.

ARTICLE VI. VII. VIII. and IX. regulate the manner of proceeding where neutral vessels are brought in, upon a presumptive of having enemy's goods on board.

ARTICLE X. The commission of marine shall present, without delay, a statement of the individuals, born subjects of the Powers with whom the republic is at war, who were taken before the present day, upon neutral vessels, that particular arrêtés may be taken in each case board neutral vessels.

ARTICLE XI. The indemnities which are due to the captains of neutral Powers who were detained by an embargo at Bordeaux, shall be liquidated without delay by the commission of marine and colonies, conformable to an arrêté of the committee of public safety of the 17th of Germinal; and this commission shall render an account, in the course of ten days, of the actual state of these demands.

ARTICLE XII. The commission of marine is specially charged to receive and adjust the accounts which shall be presented to it by an agent of the United States, for such supplies as the Americans have furnished to the administration of St. Domingo; and it shall take the necessary measures to procure to the parties interested the most prompt justice, and shall also present to the committees of public safety, of finance, commerce, and supplies, the results of its operations in these respects.

ARTICLE XIII. The commission of foreign relations is instructed to deliver a copy of this arrêté to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, in answer to his memorial of the 9th of Fructidor (September 3d) last.

The Secretary of State of the United States to Mr. Monroe.

PHILADELPHIA, December 2, 1794.

Sir:—On the 37th instant,* I had the honor of receiving the duplicate of your letter, No. 2, of the 15th of September last, being the first and only official notification of your having entered upon the duties of your mission.

Alexander Duvernet, who was appointed vice consul of Paris, during the last session of the Senate, departed here so soon, without a suspicion being entertained of his default, that the President has superseded him by commission.

With the frankness of my friendship, I must discharge the obligation of my office, by communicating to you the opinions which we entertain here concerning the speech which you made on your introduction into the National Convention.

When you left us, we all supposed that your reception, as the minister of the United States, would take place in the private chamber of some committee. Your letter of credence contained the degree of profession which the Government was desirous of making; and though the language of it would not have been cooled, even if its subsequent publicity had been foreseen; it still was natural to expect that the remarks with which you might accompany its delivery would be merely oral, and therefore not exposed to the rancorous criticism of nations at war with France.

It seems that, upon your arrival, the downfall of Robespierre, and the suspension of the usual routine of business, combined, perhaps, with an anxiety to demonstrate an affection for the United States, had shut up for a time the diplomatic cabinet, and rendered the ball of the National Convention the theatre of diplomatic civilities. We should have supposed that an introduction there would have brought to mind these ideas: "The United States are neutral—the allied Powers jealous—with England we are now in treaty—by England we have been impeached for breaches of faith in favor of France—our citizens are notoriously Gallican in their hearts—it will be wise to hazard as little as possible on an entertainment of a Frenchman, therefore, in the disclosure of my feelings, something is due to the possibility of fostering new suspicions." Under the influence of these sentiments we should have hoped that your address to the National Convention would have been so framed as to leave heart-burning no where. If private affection and opinions had been the only points to be consulted, it would have been immaterial where or how they were delivered. But the range of a public minister's mind will go to all the relations of our country with the whole world. We do not perceive that your instructions have imposed upon you the extreme glow of some parts of your address; and my letter in behalf of the House of Representatives, which has been considered by some gentlemen as too strong, was to be viewed in any other light than as executing the task assigned by the body.

After these remarks, which are never to be interpolated into any description of the French cause, I must observe to you, that they are made principally to recommend caution, lest we should be obliged, at some time or other, to explain away, or disavow, an excess of fervor, so as to reduce it down to the cool system of neutrality. You have it still in charge to cultivate the French mind with zeal, but without any unnecessary oclash; because the dictates of sincerity do not demand that we should render notorious all our feelings in favor of that nation.

In your letter you say that you have not been instructed to desire a repeal of the decree which violated the 32d and 34th articles of the treaty of commerce; that you did not know but it had been tolerated from the soundest motives of political experience, lest the example for the rescinding it might produce a call for the guarantee. Indeed, you have gone further; having declared in your memorial, that you were under no instructions to complain of, or request the repeal of, the decree authorizing a departure from those articles; and that if, upon reconsideration, after the experiment made, the committee of public safety should be of opinion that it produces any solid benefit to the French republic, the American Government, and your countrymen in general, would not only bear the departure with patience, but with pleasure.

The fourth head of injury, stated in your letter, shows that you were possessed of cases which turned entirely upon the impropriety of the decree; and such, too, was certainly the fact. Now, without the abrogation of the decree, so far as it respected those cases, the redress which you were instructed to demand, could not be obtained: in truth, there was no cause or pretense for asking relief, but upon the ground of that decree having violated the treaty. Does not this view lead to the inevitable conclusion, that the decree, if operative in future instances, would be no less than a formal recognition of its principle, and of the instances, which could be accomplished only by a total repeal. The papers of the ship Laurens contained a reference to one or more representations of Mr. Morris against the decree; so that the business had been actually broken to the French Government.

Neither these representations, nor yet your application, appears to have suggested a requisition of the guarantee.

The omission to demand its fulfillment up to this day, is a proof that their policy did not approve of such measure: and in this they were wise, since we should have been less advantageous to them by associating in the war, than we have been to our neutral character. If I am not mistaken, this sentiment has been delivered often by Mr. Fauchet. Besides, you might have very readily repelled any serious allusion to the guarantee, by saying, as your instructions indicate, that you were directed to send that subject on this side of the water. I must add another observation; that I do not see how, if you are to be delivered by the guarantee, you can have claim compensation for an infliction of the treaty, since you will always be in danger of having it brought up to you.

But, my good sir, let these things be as they will, was it necessary to intimate that an indifferrence prevailed in our Government as to these articles, by a declaration that you were not instructed to complain of the decree? I confess that I regard the data upon which such an opinion could be founded; and undoubtedly the President himself would not undertake, that the People of the United States would bear with patience a departure from stipulations which are generally believed to be important to us. But, if, from our friendship to the French republic, we might sustain a mischief with pleasure, still, we should not choose that the assumption of one of our rights, without consulting our mind, should become a pretext for the assumption of any other.

Let me, therefore, entreat you, if my letter of July 30th has not already stimulated you to remonstrate against the decree, to do so without delay. We do not wish you to swerve from the line of conciliation which is marked out in the last paragraph of your letter. On the contrary, conciliation, which does not detract from the dignity of his Government, its rights, and his own self-respect, is a valuable quality in a minister. We only hope that the committee of public safety may not continue in the belief that the Executive are of opinion that it will be satisfactory to dispense with the articles.

I am extricating myself assuming that many of Mr. Fauchet's discontents have been removed. The documents concerning the failure to salute the Semillante, and the supposed insult to the Favorite, are enclosed to you, that you may be able to evince our solicitude to cement our good will on every occasion which is offered.

Colonel Alexander Anderson, of this city, who has a claim for compensation, and whose agent will call upon you, requests me to forward the enclosed papers. I also transmit some imperfect preparatory information in the case of Mr. A. Gracie.

A fresh collection of spoliation papers is sent, according to the list subjoined. The newspapers, &c, accompany this letter. I am, &c.

From the Secretary of State of the United States to Mr. Monroe.

PHILADELPHIA, December 5th, 1794.

Sir: Since my letter of the 30th ultimo, which will be conveyed by the same vessel with this, I have had the honor of receiving your very interesting letters of August 13th and 25th. They are the more acceptable, as affording an earnest of your attention to the kind of intelligence which is, to us, very important.

We are fully sensible of the importance of the friendship of the French republic. Cultivate it with zeal, proportioned to the value you set upon it; but remember to reserve a share in the world of nations, with great Britain, or in any manner weakening our old attachment to France. The caution suggested in my letter of the 30th ultimo arises solely from an honorable wish to sustain our character of neutrality, in a style which may be a pattern for the morality of nations. The republic, while they approve of the purity of your conduct, cannot but be persuaded of the purity of our affection.
The President approves your conduct as to the national house offered for your residence. Your interpretation of the constitution is correct. But you are charged to make known this sense of this evidence of respect. The affair of the consil is noticed in my letter of the 33th ultimo.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Secretary of State.

From Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, January 13th, 1795.

Sir: I have the pleasure to inform you that, upon the report of the united committees of public safety, legislation, commerce, and finances, a decree has passed the Convention, since my last, whereby it is resolved to carry into strict execution the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and this republic. I beg leave to congratulate you upon this event, and particularly the unanimity with which this resolution was passed, the universal opinion generally, towards us. I was not, therefore, surprised, that if I could have brought the subject, in the first instance, before the Convention, I should have succeeded immediately in it. But as the committee was the department organized for such purposes one from this, Jay, announced to it the most favorable circumstances of which he had had an opportunity, and which, however, as it might tend to increase their own disensions, and embark me upon the fortune of those dissensions. Happily, by pursuing the object patiently with the committee, removing doubts, and obtaining objections, aided by occasional changes of the members, this has not only been avoided, but I have additional pleasure to assure you that it was finally accomplished, without the least difficulty, and without exciting the animosity of any one.

After my last communications to the committee of public safety, in which we were exposed freely the object of Mr. Jay's mission to England, and the real situation of the United States with Britain and Spain, I had reason to believe that all apprehensions on those points, were done away, and that the committee would be cordial towards us. I considered the report above recited, and upon which the decree was founded, as the unequivocal proof of that change of sentiment, and flattered myself, that, in every respect, we had now the best prospect of the most perfect and permanent harmony between the two republics. I am very sorry, however, to add, that my hopes have been too easily raised. Mr. Jay has pointed out the points in controversy, and concluded a treaty of commerce with that Government. Some of those accounts state, that he had also concluded a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive. As I knew the baneful effect which these reports would produce, I desired it my duty, by repeating what I had said before of his powers, to use my influence to prevent any such plot; however, did not arrest the progress of them. I was requested to remove the disquietude it had created: for I was finally applied to, directly, by the committee, in a letter, which stated what had been heard, and requested information of what I knew in regard to it. As I had just before received one from this, Jay, announcing that he had concluded a treaty, and which contained a declaration by our partners, that all treaties should not be affected by it, I thought fit to make this letter the basis of my reply. And as it is necessary that you should be apprized of whatever has passed here on this subject, I now transmit to you copies of these several papers, and which comprise a full statement thereof, up to the present time.

I cannot deny, that the object of his mission is of the utmost importance, and that any thing has been done which will give just cause of complaint to this republic. I lament, however, that he has not thought himself at liberty to give me correct information on that subject: for until it is known that their interest has not been wounded, the republic will not think of the association made by the members to the treaty, to its advantage. But I am confidence the bonds of friendship. I trust, therefore, you will deem it expedient to advise me on this head, as soon as possible.

I apprized you, in my two last letters, of an informal communication between the diplomatic members of the committee and myself, upon an interrogatory of theirs, whether it would be possible for France to obtain aid from, or with the United States, for the purchase of arms, and of my effort upon that occasion to interest this Government in support of our claims with Britain and Spain, and to which I was stimulated by intelligence that Mr. Jay's negotiation had failed, and that we were on the point of war, or actually engaged in it, with Britain, as likewise by the knowledge that Spain was covertly seeking a separate peace. I was satisfied that, if France would embark in our cause, in the manner of Mr. Jay, and of my efforts upon that occasion to interest this Government, it would be of the utmost importance, not only on the rights of humanity, but on the success of our establishment in the affairs of the Government. It has been the systematic effect of the administration to repair this waste, and heal the bleeding wounds of the country; and in this, great progress has been made. By the same report which proposed the policy of the violated treaty, the convention of amity and commerce, was likewise proposed to open wide the door of commerce between England, and France, (excluding them from navigation only,) and was adopted: so that, at present, any person bringing productions into the ports of this republic, may sell them to whom he pleases, and generally with astonishing profit. The agents of the republic stand upon the ground of other persons, (excluding the judgment of the Committee,) as to whether they are legal or illegal, wherever they may be. And under a particular state of things, some benefit may be derived from it, and no detriment under any.

The operations of this Government continue to progress in the same course they have done for some time past. During the time of Robespierre, a period of the administration which is emphatically called the reign of terror, much that has been made, not only on the rights of humanity, but on the success of our establishment in the affairs of the Government. FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Nor has this wise and humane system been limited to this object alone. It has already been extended to many branches of the French system of public policy, and proceeds to embrace the whole. A decree was not long since passed, by which the seventy-one members, formerly of the Briisonne or Girondine party, and who had been confined on that account, sat at liberty, and called into the Convention. And a few days afterwards, our countryman, Mr. Paine, was likewise restored to his seat in that body. These were the marks of a new spirit in the policies of France, given to the guidance of the majority at large. A decree, also, which had excluded the nobles and foreigners (the Americans excepted) from Paris and the seaports, has likewise been repealed. This latter act, though apparently a little importance, has, notwithstanding, produced an excellent effect; for, as it breathes a spirit of humanity, and an that accord captivates all, so it has contributed, by passing in review many, and much to the credit of the Revolution, the strong and interesting contrast between the main character of the French nation at the present day, and the miserable effeminacy, folly, and decrepitude, of formidable power.

A decree has likewise passed, by which a general amnesty has been proclaimed in the Vendéen and a report has been received from the deputies who were sent to carry it into effect, that all those to whom it was announced had lain down their arms, and arranged themselves under the banner of the republic; and that they were likewise satisfied with the terms they received, and would take no steps to recover arms, or form a new government, and would maintain the means of continuance, appear even yet to be but little understood. Freed from this embarrassment, the republic will acquire new vigor in all its enterprises; it will certainly have under its command, for other purposes, a considerate force, which was heretofore employed there.

But in retracing the ground, to repair in detail the injuries which the reign of terror had inflicted, it was impossible to behold the havoc it had made, without feeling some indignation for the authors of such great and cumulated misery. This propensity, however, and which was equally incited by the obligations of justice and humanity, was strongly opposed, from the period of Robespierre's death to the present time, by a constant of extensive impression, that it would be better to prevent the further effusion of blood, and to cover with a veil the atrocities which had passed, so far as they could be covered, than to punish even those of greatest enormity. For some time this sentiment prevaile, nel and though often irritated and disturbed by the remaining leaders of the opposite party, who courted danger and held out the hope of their impending fate, not it appeared probable it would finally prepare to calm and conclude the events within that limit. The trial, however, of the Nantes, a long train of respectable citizens at Nantes, who were arrested under the administration of Carriere, in his mission there, and brought lately before the tribunal of Paris, opened the scene again, and revived the sensation of horror, which had before in some measure subsided. Such events, indeed, in the course of a real trial, those, it is noticed, that were sent by submitting, Carriere, and his accomplices, to the tribunal, in their turn. Condemnation was the sure consequence of their trial, and it was expected, so clear was the case against him, that all those formerly of that party would now separate from and yield him. But in this, as in such a line, events are not in their line. Some of the leaders might have been arrested, and the party driven back; but a great measure on him alone; by whose punishment too, the public retribution might possibly have been satisfied. But Billard de Varennes, Collet d'Herbois, and even Barrere, a man heretofore noted for skilful movements in critical conjunctures, acted otherwise. They obviously, and from the beginning, made Carriere's cause their own; not only in defending him in the court, but as it was possible, but by exciting the Jacobin to take part in his favor; thereby attaching themselves to the declining fortunes of that club, and likewise making some unseemly motions which bore on their face the complexion of that. The separation required at best a dexterous management; but by these means they presented themselves out as an object, invited the public attention, and in the degree, the event took place. It was proposed to bring in a decree, by Leoncure, who had shown himself sufficiently prone, upon a former occasion, to commence the attack, took advantage of one of these moments of indiscretion to renew it, and with better effect. His motion was sent to the commission of twenty-one, before they could consider it, and the question whether the decision which had been passed on the said Carriere was not obtained over the Spaniards, since my last, and in which the two commanding generals, many men, were slain, and nine thousand taken prisoners. And in the North, since the ice, nearer approaches are made to Holland, which will most probably soon be taken. Within a few days past, deputies arrived from the States, at the request of that nation, this was by no means likely, for the two parties that carried the House, do not; and in reading it, who pressed the committee to order forward the troops immediately, to assault and enter; Amsterdam; and to which effect orders were accordingly issued. I am satisfied that peace will not be granted to the Netherlands, although a revolution should take place there, on any other condition than that of their uniting in the war against England. It is conceived that a peace to that Power, on other terms, would be more favorable to England than its continuance in the war: for thereby the British troops might be withdrawn, and great advantage gained in other respects from its neutrality. This, it is thought, is the object of England in ascertaining to their peace; but, in rejecting the propositions of the French, by which they promised to be in as close, and Mr. Jefferson, wrote to Mr. Paine, that great as the war, on the weight of our National credit. No argument is so strong as that of necessity, and if France will not make peace it will be impossible for England to do it. In my judgment, it is the determination of this republic to pursue the war until the maritime strength of England is broken; and when the actual state of things is regarded, with that of the comparative power of both nations, it is clear that this is the sense of the French nation, it is the only object that accompanies the object, and the rapidity in which they ship, are simple, and fleets equipped, here, is inconceivable. Within a few weeks past the Brest fleet has been out twice, (indeed it is now out) consisting of thirty-six ships of the line, fifteen frigates, fourteen squadrons of war in and cutters, giving the delusive to its antagonist, which continues close locked to the land. More latterly, however, some indications were seen on that coast, of a disposition to seize the sea, and hazard the fate of the island on a battle, so that it is probable something decisive may take place soon.

With respect to the other Powers, nothing definitive has yet been done in regard to peace. It is certain that several wish it, and particularly Spain and Prussia; but yet some difficulties have occurred in regulating the commencement and manner of the negotiation. England opposes it, because she knows she will not be included; and they, on that account, wish it to be private, merely to avoid the imputations that would arise if it were known; and this cannot well be accommodated under the present organization of the French Government. It is said that a ministerial committee was to be in Berlin, in Switzerland, with power to treat; and that they all have agents there for the same purpose is likewise probable.

I will endeavor, if possible, to forward by this opportunity a report rendered to me by Mr. Skipwith, upon the American claims. Be assured that every possible attention has been, and shall be, paid to this subject. I take the opportunity of informing you that the Committee of A. L. F. is still continued for the purpose of public safety, of the other house of the Convention for carrying into effect the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and the Polish territories; however, in which it is expressed, merit attention.

From Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, February 1, 1795.

Sir:

I was lately informed by Mr. Jay, that it was his intention to communicate to me the contents of his treaty with the British administration, and as I know the good effect which correct information upon that point would produce upon our affairs here, (admitting it to be as heretofore represented) I thought it my duty to endeavor to avail myself of the present opportunity of communicating the same to you. He has taken his copy with him, I knew that I should not be able to comprehend it, in case it was received. I therefore deemed the acquisition of it an object of sufficient importance to authorize the expense of an especial despatch to London, to obtain it, and have, in consequence, committed that trust to Mr. Purvisance, of Baltimore; who left this immediately after the receipt of Mr. Jay's letter, and who was likewise instructed to bring me a copy of Mr. Pinck-

Paris, February 19th, 1815.

Sir:—I was honored with yours of the 9th December, three days since, and by which I find that my third letter only had the effect though the proceeding, with which it was forwarded according to their respective dates, and by opportunities which promised security and despatch.

I read, with equal surprise and concern, the strictures you deemed it necessary to make upon some particulars of my conduct here, because I thought it did not merit them, and trust, upon a further view of all circumstances, you will feel no objections to my line of conduct. Giving up this time, you will possess a general view. A more particular detail, however, I think proper now to communicate.

It is objected, that I addressed the Convention with a glow of sentiment not warranted by my instructions.

Secondly, that I made public what was intended, and proposed only in a private and confidential manner, in order to keep them before me at the time, and drew it by them; of course I thought it did not, and I now think so. The force, however, of this objection, is, I presume, comprised in the second: for, if the communication had been in private, and not in public, the objection, most probably, would not have been made. Upon this point, therefore, a more particular detail is unnecessary, and, for this purpose, a full view of the circumstances and motives which influenced my conduct, equally so.

Upon my arrival here, I found our affairs, as it was known they were before I sailed, in the worst possible situation. The treaty between the two republics, though vainly pressed by the committee, or the governing party in it, were disposed to delay my reception, throw me entirely out of view, and destroy altogether the effect of my mission. It was said, that, as my principles were with them, I ought, on that account, to be the more dreading: for, if they confided in me, I should only pull them asunder, and, under the impression on foot, I was viewed with a suspicious eye, and kept at the most awful distance. This deportment towards me was so observable, that it attracted the attention of the representatives of other Powers here, and was, most probably, communicated elsewhere.

Into what consequences this policy, which was hostile to us, might lead, I could not readily perceive; but I was alarmed on that head; and for well knowing that I was circumstanced against our Executive, and not under the impression, and in which shape it threatened to break out, pursued with passion, as I had reason to apprehend it would be, to found on our national character, but likewise disturb our internal tranquillity, and, perhaps, involve us in war.

The effect of it, was, in the first step and the idea from which it was prosperous, I was fearful it would be taken. Thus circumstances, what course did policy dictate that I should pursue? Did it become me to look on as a tranquil spectator of machinations that pertended so much mischief to my country? or, was it more wise, more consistent with the obligations of the trust which I had accepted, to make a decisive effort to defeat them? After adopting the latter counsel, in what line should that effort be directed, or by what means enabled to succeed? The doors of the committee, as already mentioned, were closed against me; and, had it been otherwise, knowing, as I did, the disposition of that body towards us, would it have been prudent to have deposed those documents under its care, since they furnished the only means by which I could carry a negotiation through? But my presence there was a necessary condition upon which the Powers would produce, in the councils of that body, any change of sentiment, advised as it had been, and armed as it was, with a series of contrary evidence, and in which it would place a greater confidence? I can assure you, with great sincerity, that, had I been taking it in my professional capacity, I should have regarded for this nation and its Revolution, (though indeed the word was not used) the people at large were settled on the right side. The abettors of a contrary doctrine were, in a great measure, confounded; and as soon as the impression upon the public mind had time to react back upon the public councils, aided by the little incidents I caught at to inspire confidence, together with a change of the members of the committee, was the object, even in that body, though slowly, yet finally, completely accomplished.

But you intimate that I ought to have shunned this publicity, from the fear it might injure our depending negotiations with Britain and Spain. Had I seen cause to apprehend that consequence, I should certainly been more averse to the measure. But that there was none, on the contrary that it would produce the opposite effect, was, in my opinion, certain. In demonstrating this, permit me to develop, according to my idea of it, the object of Mr. Jay's mission, and the contingencies upon which his success depended. This will show the relation which mine had to his, and more satisfactorily than I can otherwise do, the motives, in that respect, of my conduct.

I understood that the sole object of Mr. Jay's mission was to demand the surrender of the posts, and compensation for injuries, and was persuaded that his success would depend upon two primary considerations—the success of the French armies, and the state of the public debts, most particularly the former. Under the consideration of these events, I concluded that his mission would fail: for we know that a long and arduous negotiation for the first object had already proved abortive, and we saw in the preceding year, when Toulon was taken, and fortune seemed to favour upon the arums of this republic, that an order was issued for those spoliations of which we so justly complain. We likewise saw afterwards, when the spirit of this nation was roused, and its victory attended its efforts, that that order was rescinded, and some respect shown to the United States. Thus it appeared that our fortune, at least so far as depended upon Britain, and of course the success of Mr. Jay's mission, depended upon that of France.

In that case, therefore, it could not redound to our advantage, and especially in the negotiation with Britain, without a good understanding and concert with the French Government: for without which, we could neither count upon success in negotiation, nor in case it failed, upon the fortunate issue of arms, if war should be appealed to. But we were under hopes that any other than the appearance of the British forces, not that we were not accommodated, we would join in the war against them: we could not accept it at the price of an equivalent, and thus pay again for what was already ours: nor could we expect it from the affection, the justice, or the liberality of that court: for we well knew, that if it had possessed those virtues, we should not have had any complaint. But we could not join in the war, nor even avails ourselves of that argument in negotiation, without a concert with France: for, without such concert, we might commence at the moment she was about to conclude whereby we should be left alone to contend with that Power, who would probably be supported by Spain. If, then, it is a doctrine, and it is admitted that the success of Mr. Jay's mission depends upon a good understanding of facts, and it is essential that we should possess all the information we can, before we attempt to evaluate the effect of such an event. It is of course, in the public interest that this event should be accurately estimated.

It has been well known that, if any such concession has been made, it was immediately communicated by its instruments here, and for the purpose of weakening the confidence of this Government in our own—a practice systematically pursued heretofore, and with the hope of separating, or at least of preventing, any kind of concert between the friends of peace and the promoters of another war. I am well aware of the motive for greater caution would have been stronger. But the case was in every respect otherwise. Her fortunes were at the height of prosperity, and those of her enemies decisively on the decline. It was obvious that nothing was wanting to preserve tranquility at home, but the good understanding of this republic towards us. By the measure, therefore, I thought that every thing was to be gained and nothing to be lost.

Upon the third point I have little need be said. I have some time transmitted to you a decree which carried the treaty into effect, and yielded the point in question. Satisfied I am, too, it was greatly forwarded, if not absolutely obtained, by the manner in which it was urged: for a generous policy is better calculated to produce a good effect here, than a strict one: and other than in this light my declaration cannot be considered. Surely I did not concede the point, nor intimate an indifference upon it: on the contrary, I labored, with the greatest force of which I was capable, to induce the French Government to remain in their present position. But, I am conscious, as well as thou, that it was not in their power to make a stipulation as this, they would not be on the slightest inclination. In the interval between the period of those communications which were made by me to the committee, explanatory of our situation with Britain, Spain, &c. and the arrival of the intelligence of Mr. Jay's treaty, the indications of this disposition were extremely strong, for at that time I had reason to believe that it contemplated to take under its care, and to provide for, our protection against Algiers; for the expulsion of the British from the Western posts, and the establishment of our right with Spain to the free navigation of the Mississippi, to be executed in the mode we should prefer, and upon terms perfectly easy to us: terms, in short, which sought only the aid of our credit to obtain a loan from our own lands for an considerable sum, to be laid out in the purchase of provisions, within our own country, and to be reimbursed, if possible, by themselves. But, by that intelligence, this disposition was checked, but not changed: for it is with the course of opinions, as with that of bodies, and which are not easily be forced in an opposite direction, after they have decisively taken a particular one. I mention this for your information, not indeed in that manner of manner, but still inclined to believe that, if the arrangement with England, or the negotiation with Spain, should fail, it is possible, provided a suitable attempt be made here before a peace is closed with those Powers, respectively, to accomplish the whole through the means of the French, which, perhaps, would be disposed to be rather than those who would rightfully subject us to the imputation of a breach of neutrality. Well satisfied I am, that the full weight of its fortunes might be thrown with decision into our scale, and in a manner that would enable us to take those fortunes to the best account in negotiation.

Mr. de Lafayette was lately set at liberty and, although I could not make a formal application in her favor, yet it was done in accommodation with that which was informally made. She attended immediately at my house, to declare the obligation she owed to our country, and of which she manifested the highest sense, and on her return she said, she thought it was time we made the most of the occasion, and in consequence required aid, not only for present support, but to discharge the debts that were already due, and for which she applied to me: and was thereupon furnished with a sum in assignats, equivalent to about one thousand dollars in specie. I made this advance upon the principle that it was my duty to do it, as the representative of the United States, and in the expectation that the like sum, which would be paid to my order by her bankers in Amsterdam, would be taken from the fund appropriated to the use of her husband by the Congress in the course of the last year. Is this approved? and may I, upon that fund, make advances, adequate to her support, and for which the interest will be charged.

A treaty of peace, or rather of amity, with Tuscany, with the progress of a revolution in Holland, which has been more rapid than I expected it would be, are the only events worthy that have taken place since my last, and for more particular details respecting which I beg leave to refer you to Mr. Adet, to whose care the present is committed.

P. S. I herewith enclose you a report from Mr. Skipwith, upon some cases that were noticed in your last dispatch; as likewise upon some others, upon which application will most probably be made to you, and whereby you will be enabled to give satisfactory information to the parties concerned.

From the Secretary of the State of the United States to Mr. Monroe.

PHILADELPHIA, February 13, 1793.

DEAR SIR: The last date which I have received from you, is of the 16th of September, 1794, and it has been duly acknowledged and duplicates. It occasioned no small anxiety as to the issue of many points which you had brought before the French Government: especially incident to the project of suspending the reestablishing the stipulation between the United States and France, making goods free which are found in free ships. It has appeared only in a translation, and there is ambiguity enough in its present dress to lead us to hope that the treaty may have been designed at the beginning of the clause, to be in full force, may possibly be an exception still, to the general provision for condoning hostile property in neutral bottoms.
We do not doubt that we should have obtained the most ample explanation of this, and every other of our relations to France, had not the advice boat, which was lately despatched from hence, been captured by a British frigate.

Mr. Oudard, formerly, and Mr. Adet recently, have been appointed in his place. If this should be true, and Mr. Fauchet is, as we suppose, unaccompanied towards the French interest, it is rather an unpleasant circumstance that, upon a change of party, we are to expect a change of minister. However, the only thing which really concerns us, is, that the representative of the French republic in the United States should lay aside all intrigue, and imitate ourselves in a course of plain and fair dealing.

We confide that you have lost no opportunity of fixing the friendship of the two countries upon solid grounds. On our part, we really do all that we can to form one in every respect. The legislative act, which has within these few weeks enabled Mr. Fauchet to use, by anticipation, the instalments of the French debt due in September and November next, amounting to two millions and a half of livres. But I am afraid that Mr. Fauchet, and probably the French nation, have been urged to believe that the treaty said to have been concluded by Mr. Jay with Great Britain, interferes with our engagements with the United States, and that thecconduit is not to hand yet, and therefore before I can deliver no decided opinion on it. But, so far is this from any instruction to Mr. Jay, that I am persuaded he could not think of a treaty having such an object. In the principal heads of the negotiation—the surrender of the forts, the exchanges and stipulations of our creditors, and the union of British, Dutch, and Spanish colonies and possessions—there is no provision for the production of a treaty which shall interfere with the access to the West Indies, with as few restrictions as possible, must be desirable to us. But let the possession of them ultimately centre in France or England, we shall, I presume, be unfettered by our contracts with the one, so as to be at perfect liberty to contract with the other.

I shall give you no comments upon the proceedings of Congress until they rise, which will be in a fortnight hence. At present, you will receive by the French ship, which Mr. Fauchet despatches, your quota of newspapers.

The conduct of Spain towards us is still very variable and injurious. Mr. Pinckney is over to Madrid, and is said to have brought matters to a conclusion some way or other. But you will seize any favorable moment to execute what has been entrusted to you respecting the Mississippi.

Colonel Humphreys, our minister for Lisbon, being disappointed in the loan which was to be opened to the relief of our captive nation, is at the moment of going to press engaged in trying to procure it. But I understand that we have heard nothing of late concerning the friendly interposition of France with the Dewy, we beg that the influence of our ally may be exerted in this great cause of humanity.

I am, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, February 18, 1795.

I have just been honored with your favor of the 30th December, and an answer gratified by its contents. The preceding one of the 2d, I shall give me great satisfaction, but this has reached me. I sincerely wish my two first letters had reached you in the order they were written, as they would have prevented yours of the 2d December, by preventing the impression which gave birth to it.

Be assured I shall continue to forward, by all the means in my power, the objects of my mission, and I am persuaded Mr. Jay will assist me in every means which might result from those efforts, addressed to the councils of a nation well disposed favorably to receive them. The object of this is to acknowledge the receipt of your last letter, and in the expectation that it will accompany, under the care of Mr. Adet, my last dispatch, which was in answer to the preceding one.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, March 6, 1795.

I avail myself of the opportunity of Mr. Adet, who leaves this to succeed Mr. Fauchet, of transmitting here with some communications which have lately passed between the committee of public safety and myself, upon the subject of my interesting claims with Spain; and which will serve not only still further to illustrate my former dispatches upon that subject, but likewise to show the precise meaning which I attached to the understanding, so far as I have been able to comprehend it, which was the basis of the articles of Commerce, which I have recently been informed have been signed with that full power on the part of Spain, which before our differences were compromised. Thus circumstanced, I deemed it my duty, in conformity with my instructions, and the more especially, as they had no right to make any inference with respect to that project other than I had stated to bring the subject more fully before them than I had before done. The papers enclosed, which comprise the whole of what passed between us upon this subject, you will observe a note of Mr. de Dauny, and which, though given by a single member, and in reply to an informal application, yet, as it marks a retaining solicitude upon the transaction to which it refers, I have thought it equally my duty to transmit for your information.

No peace is yet made with Spain, nor indeed with any other Power, Tuscany excepted, which was before communicated but it is still probable that one will be made with that Power, and likewise with Prussia. It is, however, well known, that England is against it; and as they will, if necessary, shew that necessity exists, it is possible that those arguments which are used by the minister in the House of Commons, to forward the preparations for war, may have weight in the cabinets of other Powers, and incline them to protract any definitive arrangement with this republic, until just before the commencement of the campaign, in the hope of profiting in the interim by such events as the chapter of accidents may throw their way. But I cannot think, if the tranquillity which now reigns here should remain unadulterated, and the incidents of the interval, in other respects prove favorable to the Revolution, that either of them, and especially Spain, will hazard the probable evils of another campaign, for any benefit she can possibly expect from it. In truth, the state of the war, so far as they were ever understood, are now understood, is such as it is possible for the calms of the republic was among them, that must of course be considered as abandoned. Or if the restoration of the ancient monarchy was the sole hope of accomplishing it by arms must now likewise be considered as gone. Nations acting entirely on the defensive, never dream of conquering. The only remaining moment when the confidence Powers can depend on the success, is founded in the possibility of some internal commotion being excited by the scarcity of provisions, the derangement of their finances, or the divisions of their councils—calamities, it is true, or either of them could, if rendered too violent, provided it attained to a certain height, which it admitted would be sufficient to produce the effect that is the object aimed at.

But whether France is threatened with real danger from this source, or either of those views, the problem is to be solved. Upon the two first points, I do not pretend at present to be able to decide with certainty; indeed, the best informed can only conjecture. Bread I know is scarce in some parts; and it is possible much distress may be experienced in those quarters, if foreign supplies are not obtained, and in great amount; but these are expected from the North and from America. It is probable, too, that this scarcity has been increased by the speculation of individuals, and in which case it will diminish as the exigency disappears.

Nor am I skilled in their financial policy. When I arrived, the assigns were depreciated in comparison with specie at the rate of five pounds to one. The assignats and the sums occasionally emitted, are wonderfully great, and the depreciation must follow as a thing of course. What measures will be taken with the paper is yet doubtful. Formerly, it had depreciated in equal or greater degree, and then it was elevated to par, by striking out of circulation all the bills of a certain description, securing those remaining, and giving the nation a control over the public resources. It was urged that the nation was in a position to regulate the price of every thing. Whether some measures of the like kind will be again adopted, or whether any attempt will be made to appreciate the paper, is equally uncertain. Many consider the appreciation as an evil to be avoided, preferring to continue the paper, and thus gaining a private contract, and redeeming the whole at the rate it passed in the last stage of circulation. I think it probable this latter policy will finally prevail, as it is advocated with ability and zeal by some who were tutored in our school.

The subject, however, is still under discussion, and nothing absolutely decided on it. If this latter plan should be preferred, the paper will take the place of specie or even perhaps of currants of 1793. It will probably elapse before the final suspension; and after this, the republic will stand nearly upon the same ground on which it commenced. Its debt will be but small, and it will possess, besides the ordinary resources of taxation, &c. national domains to an immense amount; equal, by estimation, to at least two hundred millions sterling, in specie; supported interest of the 3d and old 3d (October, 1792), and the invasion of the 3d will threaten the arms. I will, however, take a more accurate survey of this subject, and give you the result as soon as possible.

And upon the subject of those dangers which are presumed to menace the safety of this republic from the division of its body, I have but little to add at present to the details already furnished. The papers heretofore forwarded, contain the report of the commission of twenty-one, upon the denunciation of Barrere, &c. and which finds cause of accusation. As soon as the report is printed, the denounced will be heard before the Convention, who will decide, by what is called the appel nominal, for their acquittal or trial; and in the latter case, they will, in convention, be embodied and arranged against the government. This, in my opinion, is a mistake; for the danger to which the government, previously abscond, as one of them (Vader) has already done, and which it is wished, even by those most active in the prosecution, they all may do. This particular incident will not be new to you, and in other respects, the counsels delivered to you from the time of my arrival have been repeated. In contemplating the possible effects of this prosecution, or what may be called a division of the public counsels, the friends of the Revolution have cause to regret that, since a decision upon the conduct of these members was taken, it was not sooner taken. If it had followed immediately after the execution of Robespierre, it would have been more effectually bringing the party collision, too frequent, and the want of precaution, to the government dangers which would not otherwise have existed: for by the delay, the twofold crisis of the trial, and of famine, or rather the scarcity of provisions, will take place precisely at the same moment; than which there certainly could not be a coincidence of events more favorable to the views of the imprisoned Powers, or unfavorable to those of the Dutch. In the original course of this transaction, that, although the preponderating party has denounced, and may finally execute, these members, it has, notwithstanding, acted rather upon the defensive than otherwise. Had the prosecution been undertaken with that degree of zeal and vigor, of which so decided a member as Sane could be capable, no one, since they have carried off, has much to fear. Of course, they have obviously no plan; nor indeed is it probable there was any on the other: for I am convinced that the real object at least four out of five, on both sides, has been to complete the Revolution. The coincidence, therefore, must be deemed one of those unlucky, but fortuitous arrangements, forced by the course of events, not to be controlled, and under which the preponderating party, who is, in some respects, the cause of them, has been the last to act. The conclusion is, perhaps, the more convincing because of the repeated tendency to demonstrate the truth of this position. Nor have the citizens of this republic merits of these other respects, the reputation for truth and licentiousness, often ascribed to them in foreign countries; for it is unquestionable that, the great atrocities which have stained the different stages of the Revolution, and particularly those committed in the 3d and last September, are irreparable by any public sentiment. And terminated in the arrrestation and destruction of the Girondine party, did not proceed from a licentious commotion of the people. On the contrary, it is believed that many of the immediate agents in the first were not inhabitants of Paris. From Paris itself, and some even from Italy, put in motion by some secret cause not yet fully understood. It is also affirmed, that the great mass of the people of Paris were ignorant of what was perpetrating at the time of the transaction, and that those who knew of it were struck with the same horror that we were when we heard of it on the other side of the Atlantic. And the movement of the 31st of May, when they were called to the guillotine, showed them what was the movement, a movement in their part, in obedience to the law, and for which they were regularly summoned, and commanded by the ordinary officers. It is said that the great mass knew nothing of the object to which they were to be made instrumental; that the secret was deposited with a few only in the Convention, as Robespierre, Danton, &c. who governed the operation, and the Mayor of the city, the Gen. A.M. his secretary, and the other marshals of the city. The party in the house which controlled the movement, knew how to turn it to good account. The Mayor, a partis- San of Robespierre, &c. had a few days before presented a petition, demanding the arrrestation of the twenty-two members, and was heard by the house: he undertook to frequent the house by Convention, a leading member of the same party, that they, the most discontented, and which he said occasioned the movement in question, and threatened the annihilation of the Convention, could not be satisfied, unless those obnoxious members were arrested. And as the Girondine party did not control the movement, or know any thing about it, otherwise than as appearances announced, and which were true. The mover of the petition was the brother of the dead, the other members of the house, of course, were to be true, and the members in consequence arrested. Thus, by mere finesse, and under a dexterous management, the Girondine party was completely over throwed, and the Mountain party as completely established on its ruins, and the people, long in profound darkness, in a state of profound weakness, as in a state of profound fright. The fashionable people, in clumb show by the latter, were the object of terror, and the cause of the overthrow of the former, notwithstanding it was as it were a species of the execution of the law, and equally so in the public estimation.

These latter details may, perhaps, appear inapplicable to the subject; but, as I consider them of some importance, as well from the side of the Revolution as from that of the Republic, I have thought it my duty to make them known to you. I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant, W. L. W.
suggest. Permit me to ask, is he an American citizen? and if so, whether by birth or naturalization; and, in the latter case, whether he became such since the Revolution? If, in the last description, his arrival will subject me to great embarrassments, and, for reasons given in my fourth letter, of the 18th October last; and to which, with those from the commissary of foreign affairs to me, transmitted at the same time, I beg leave to refer you. I candidly think, if his situation is known, being a person deemed by the English law a subject of that crown, he will not be recognized, or if recognized, not without great reluctance. Shall I announce him, then, withholding a communication of the fact, admitting it to be a fact? In case I do, and it is afterwards discovered, what will be the impression of this Government towards myself, and especially after what has passed between us on the same subject: finding that I had placed, without their knowledge, in office, and immediately in the presence of the public councils, a person of a description against which they had particularly objected? And that it will be discovered, and immediately, in most certain: for there are already letters for him here from England, and these will most probably be multiplied tenfold after his arrival; besides, the character, &c. of every foreign agent, and of every grade, being an object of systematic political inquiry, is always well known. But admitting the acquiescence of this Government in it, in other views this subject merits attention. It is to be observed, that a great proportion of the business of our countrymen here is transacted with the Government. The adjustment frequently requires my official support. If, then, he does not possess the confidence of the Government, he will not only be unable to render that service to our countrymen which he expected from his station, but, as he will be brought officially into frequent and familiar communication with me, it will follow, that precisely that portion of distrust to which he is subject, will attach itself to me, and produce a correspondent effect, to a certain degree, upon every subject depending here in which we are interested. I know well that, if my fourth letter had been received, I should not have been placed in this dilemma; but, upon the fact as it is, I do not know, I console myself under the idea that it will, but, by delaying his departure until that letter was received, put it in your power to reconsider the appointment.

P.S. March 2. Since writing the above, I have been explicitly assured by Mr. Pellet, a member of the diplomatic section of the committee of public safety, that, in confidence, Mr. Jay's treaty contained nothing which would give uneasiness here; they had expressly instructed their agent, now negotiating with Spain, to use his utmost efforts to secure for us the points in controversy between the United States and that Power. In consequence, I thought proper to inform you of the circumstance, and to intreat you to make proper exertions in order that the negotiation might be conducted with the utmost propriety, and with the utmost effect. The authority of that committee was, and is, in the hands of Mr. Mountflower, the agent of the United States; and I likewise enclose with the report of Mr. Mountflower, by whom it was delivered. What the success of their endeavors in our behalf may be, is uncertain; but we cannot expect the conclusion of their own treaty will be long delayed, or that it will not be favorable to our views.

I had forgotten to notify you, officially, the present I had made to the Convention of our flag. It was done in consequence of the order of that body, for its suspension in its hall, and an intimation from the President himself, that they had none, and were ignorant of the model. I herewith send you a copy of my note to him accompanying it.

From the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Committee of Public Safety.

Paris, January 25, 1795.

I have thought proper to present to your view, in the enclosed paper, the situation of the United States in relation to the river Mississippi, and respecting which, a negotiation is now depending with the court of Spain. This paper opens fully this interesting subject in its relation to both republics, and which it is proper you should be correctly informed of at the present time. France can only assist in opening the river by an agent on the part of the United States; Mr. Short, to act in concert with her when she shall conclude her treaty with that Power, and which, by her permission, can easily accomplish, or by comprising it in her own treaty. I have no power to treat upon this subject, otherwise than by bringing it thus before you, for the purpose of ascertaining what your disposition is upon it, and which, with any comments you may be pleased to make, I shall be happy immediately to communicate to the American Government.

Notes respecting the river Mississippi, communicated to the Committee of Public Safety.

Paris, January 25, 1795.

The river Mississippi extends from about the forty-eighth degree of north latitude to the twenty-ninth, where it empties into the Gulf of Mexico, running nearly a north and south course, and through a tract of the most fertile country in the world.

It bounds the United States to the west, from latitude thirty-one to its source; an extent, pursuing the course of the river, of about two thousand miles.

Many rivers empty into the Mississippi on the east; the principal of which are the Illinois and the Ohio, and which, with their branches, spread through the whole of the western interior of the United States, and make it a most delightful region. Other rivers empty into it from the west, of which the Missouri is the most important. This latter has never been traced to its source, although voyagers have passed up it above one thousand five hundred miles. It is, however, believed, that it penetrates further into the bosom of the continent than the Mississippi itself.

The whole of that portion of the United States lying west of the Alleghany mountains, and which comprises about one-half of the territory within the said States, depends upon this river for the export of its productions to foreign markets. It comprehends a portion of the territory of several of the existing States: perhaps one-third of Pennsylvania, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia, Georgia, Tennessee, the whole of the Territory of the United States, lying between the Ohio and the Mississippi, which has already been laid out into five separate States, and which are to be admitted into the Union with the same rights as the old States, when they shall, respectively, attain a certain number of inhabitants. Of these, it is proposed to settle one only at a time, and of which the first has already been thus connected.

When we examine the extent of this territory; its fertility, superior to that of the old States; the felicity of its climate, lying all within the temperate zone; the kind and quality of its productions, such as hemp, flour, corn, short in every thing necessary in human life, protected in its infant settlements by the Government of the United States, and which is certain to attain a great degree of membership with them, we are compelled to appreciate it more highly than any other vacant tract known upon the globe.

Its settlement is of importance to all those European countries whose inhabitants are engaged in manufactures, because it will furnish, in abundance, rude materials for every species of manufacture. For these, which have the cultivation, at times, for the supply of provisions, because it will furnish an exhaustless source of every species of provision, but it is of peculiar importance to those which have islands in the West Indies, because it lies in the neighborhood of those islands, the month of the Mississippi being nearly in the same latitude, and will furnish every thing in demand there, such as lumber, provisions, &c.

But the commerce of this country, when settled, will depend upon the navigation of the Mississippi, and of course the settlement itself will depend upon the same cause. This was secured by a treaty of peace between the United States and France, in 1783, but has hitherto been perpetually suffers from most remarkably unjust and illogical. A negotiation, the object of which, on our part, is to open it, is, and has been, depending with that Power, since that time.
At the time our peace was made with England, the importance of this country was little known in her coun-sils. It is said that her negotiators did not even know on which side of the lakes, and, of course, within whose jurisdiction, the forts, which have since been the subject of contention, lay. But its importance was soon afterward understood. It is now so thoroughly known that it has regained its respectability, in hopes either of gaining it to herself, or otherwise making it subservient to her schemes of policy. With this view she refused to surrender the posts, excited the Indians to make war on our frontiers, encouraged Spain to refuse our right to the navigation of the Mississippi, and did us other injuries of the same kind.

It is certain that the Western people will, sooner or later, open this river, either by negotiation or by force, and more than probable that England, retaining, as she still does, her resentiment against the old States, for their independence, and against France for the aid given in that war, will watch the unessential of the Western people, on account of the obstructed navigation of the river, and improve it into an opportunity of separation of the old State, and connecting them with her interest in Canada, by under-taking to open the Mississippi to both countries. And with this view, it is said, that she has long had agents there to treat upon this subject: and that nothing has prevented her success but the attachment the people have to their brethren in the old States, their repugnance to become the sport of foreign politics, and which would follow their separations; and the particular anxiety they bear to that Power. Next to conquest, separation would be the most advantageous arrangement for Britain; for, in consequence, and especially if opened under her auspices, she would become the ally of the Western States, and play them off against the Eastern; whereby their importance and weight in the scale of nations would be increased. If this be the case, Britain will, with this view, that she was at the bottom of the late insurrection on the frontier, and which grew out of the discontent proceeding from the occlusion of the river.

But the same motive which inclines England to promote the separation of the new from the old States, should dispose France to prevent it. And a little reflection will convince you of this, that, if they united they will continue so by the separation, therefore, Britain might gain, but France could not.

It is, then, the interest of France to keep the whole of this territory under the same Government; but this cannot be done unless the intrigues of England be defeated, and the Mississippi be opened under the patronage of the United States. It is, therefore, the interest of France to yield her aid to her ally to open this river, and which, at the present crisis, would most probably produce a decisive effect. Nor would her retribution be limited to those considerations only which have been already mentioned. Experience has shown that those alliances are not only the most beneficial, but likewise most durable, which are founded equally on the affection and the interest of the parties, and by this act of friendship, France would establish a claim to the gratitude of the American people, which, by pervading every quarter, would reach the heart of every citizen. It would be known to the present race and remembered by posterity, that, by the aid of France, the old States were enabled to gain their independence, and that, likewise, by her aid, the new States commenced their settlement, grew up in the enjoyment of their rights, and attained their majority.

In the present state of the war with Spain, it is presumed that France may obtain what is here proposed; and, indeed, infinitely more, either in the islands or even in South America, and without the least difficulty. Her system is a system of freedom to the world, as well in respect to the rights of nations as of men. It is therefore hoped she will avail herself of the present opportunity, not only to verify that fact, but to manifest, at the same time, the pleasure with which she embraces every opportunity that occurs to promote the interest of her ally.

From the Committee of Public Safety to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

CITIZEN MINISTER: PARIS, 17th Pluviose, (February 8th, 1795) 3d year of the republic.

We have received, with your letter of 9th Pluviose, a note explanatory of the situation of the United States in regard to the river Mississippi.

We acknowledge, by the solicitude which you show in the negotiation of this affair, that nothing which can tend to confirm the bonds of friendship and harmony between the two first republics in the world is strange or indifferent-to you. We thank you for the ideas you have communicated to us. We will examine them profoundly, and we will communicate to you, without delay, our observations upon your note. But we appreciate, beforehand, the motives of this loyal communication.

CAMBACERES, MERLIN, &c. PELET,

From the Secretary of State of the United States to Mr. Monroe.

PHILADELPHIA, March 8th, 1795.

SIR: On the 16th ultimo I had the honor of writing to you at large; and on the 20th of the same month I received your letters of October 16th, November 7th and 20th, 1794.

Being uncertain whether I may not be required at the next moment to close this letter, I shall not undertake to answer your dispatches fully; though I will proceed as far as the hurry of the opportunity will permit.

I have the pleasure to inform you that the President most approves your attention to our commerce; and the merchants who are immediately interested, and to whom I have communicated your measures, think them judicious.

The temporary appointment of Mr. Skipwith, and his report, have been also well received. But the circumstances of his withdrawing from your secret, the want of information of its communications, and an ignorance of what you had done, caused a Mr. Pitcairn to be named consul for Paris, pretty early in the late session of the Senate. I shall send a general instruction to the consuls to obey the directions of the ministers of the United States. Should such a post be given to Mr. Pitcairn, I pray you may use that man with prudence, and prevent the consequences.

Your observations as to passports have for some time occurred to me. Those which have been issued from this Department lately, have been governed by strict rules; and great repulse and calumny have fallen upon the chief officer, from the mouths of foreign aristocrats, who are a kind of half-fledged citizens of the United States, by having resided there a few months.

Your history of the Jacobin societies was so appropriate to the present times in our own country, that it was conceived proper to furnish the public with those useful lessons; and extracts were published, as from a letter of a gen-dleman who is a friend of that happy man.

Last night the treaty with Great Britain arrived. It will remain undeviled by the Executive until the 8th of June next, when the Senate will assemble to deliberate on its ratification. I perceive that Mr. Fauchet is very unhappy; but upon what grounds, which are justifiable, I know not. The posts, and the spoliations of commerce, will never be made up; not, however, by the usual mode of negotiation; and it is certain that England, in a subsequent negotiation, are the judges. Our trade may also be regulated by any treaties which we please; and no other Government can command of offence, unless we derogate from its rights. You are acquainted with the restrictions on Mr. Jay, against the weakening of our engagements with France and, as far as is consistent with the truly independent, not to speak, I have not been harbored any reasonable ground for dissatisfaction in the French republic: for it cannot be supposed that the French nation would be displeased that our disputes with other nations should be concluded. But you will not judge from what I say that my opinion is formed whether the treaty will or will not be ratified. However, your idea as to Denmark and, you know, though he always allies and knows of less importance, and state

after bearing farther from you concerning it. You will have concluded, from one of my late letters, that the step is viewed here as a very strong one.

My attention is, however, on the commercial relation to France, and your conduct as to Mr. Gardouvi's letter, prove your judgment and assiduity. Nor are your measures as to Mr. Paine, and the lady of our friend, less approved. Colonel Humphry's is here arranging the affair of Algiers. Be so good as to bring to the earliest issue the points which you have pressed upon the French republic; and, particularly, the fifteen thousand dollars advanced to the people of St. Domingo, which may still be repaid to them in effect.

My next letter will be devoted to the two important passages in your letters, conveying intelligence of your movements respecting Spain and Great Britain.

The sentiments from Mr. Monroe cannot be submitted to your discretion, and to do with them what may be best and proper. Those of Mr. King, relative to the ship Andrew, make a part of the business already in your hands.

Mr. Taylor will prepare, for this conveyance, your newspapers, &c. I am, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, March 17th, 1795.

Sir:

I have just received a letter from Mr. Jay of the 5th of February,* in answer to mine of the 17th January preceding, and by which he declines to communicate to me the purport of his treaty with the English Government, although he had previously promised it. As he has explicitly declared himself to this effect, I consider the business of course, closed between him and me: nor shall I make any further comment on it, were I not otherwise impelled by the style of his reply, which is obviously addressed more for your consideration than mine. To you, therefore, my comments upon that reply shall also be submitted.

Mr. Jay says that he has no right to communicate the treaty, since it belongs exclusively to the Governments which concluded it. This is a principle which I believe him to have maintained, but the subject is not raised by him, nor is it discussed by him with me, nor is it communicated with his Government only. If this proposition is true, which (especially if no latitude is given by his instructions) I am willing to admit, it follows that, as the injunction of secrecy applies to the whole instrument, it must, of course, to every part. It was absurd to say that, in the gross, or as an entire thing, it must be kept secret; and that it may be suitable to his own ends. How, then, in this manner, having in his three several letters communicated a particular article, and promised, in the second, the whole? But he likewise says that the communication was intended to be confidential, or, in other words, to be secret; for his letters were not to be the subject of public discussion. But will his letters bear that construction? Does it appear as if the communication was intended merely to guard the secret of the treaty, and to prevent its being announced to me an event favorable to our country? On the contrary, does it not appear, from each of his letters, that he had anticipated the disquietude of this Government upon the subject of the treaty, and wished to remove it; and that the communication promised by him was addressed for that purpose, and to be used for public purposes? In short, had I been in a private station, is it probable he would have written or communicated any thing to me on the subject? Certain, however, it is, that in no view was it possible for me to consider the communication promised, though formed a confidential one, as imposing on me any other restraint than that of caution; whilst it evinced here a wanting confidence in his country, and a readiness to discuss the state of his own nation. As I really believed, at the time I wrote to Mr. Jay, that he intended to make the communication in question, and likewise concluded, from his own assurances, as well as from other circumstances, that the treaty comprised in it only the most just cause of dishonor to our country, I thought I could not better have been guided, or the interest of our country, (especially as Mr. Morris had taken a very liberal and confidential person for it. You will therefore judge of my surprise when, instead of the communication expected, I received his letter of the 5th of February, containing an absolute refusal to make it.

But in reviewing now several letters, it is difficult to ascertain what he intended to do, or what his real object was in writing them. For he says in these, that he is not at liberty to disclose the purport of his treaty, and yet promises it; that he will give me the contents, or principal heads, to enable me to satisfy this Government, but yet will give them only in confidence, and, of course, under an injunction that will put it out of any power to give the satisfaction it prepared him to grant. And, finally, when application is made, upon the basis of his own letters, for the information in question; and for the purpose by him contemplated, he not only refuses to comply with what he had promised, but criminiates this Government for entertaining any uneasiness or making any inquiry on the subject.

What is here passing upon is this: that Mr. Jay has not communicated to me a thing that he has promised he would, if he were disposed to do it; that he has, in his present instance, the justice of the demand, on the part of the latter, is of course admitted. There may, indeed, be some merit in offering it before the demand is made; but to make the offer, and then recede from it, subjects the party thus acting to an additional proportional reproach. Had Mr. Jay, however, chosen to place himself in this dilemma, from me he would have heard nothing of the state of the treaty. I should have lamented, it is true, that he was not possessed of information that might be useful to our affairs here; but there the business would have ended; for both his promise and my application were, and still are, unknown to this Government. But to recede in the manner he has done, putting his refusal on the ground of national dignity, &c. is neither consistent with candor, nor the true state of things.

Had Mr. Jay confined to me the information in question, and in due time, and which it is obvious he thought himself in duty bound to do, I should then have become responsible for a proper use of it; and, I am satisfied, admitting it to be as by him represented, good use might have been made of it; for I should not only have been enabled thereby to quiet their fears, and whose legitimacy he acknowledges by his efforts to remove them, and silence a thousand unfounded insinuations whispered abroad by the enemies of both countries, but by the frankness of the communication, have most probably made the incident the means of conciliating, instead of wakening, the friendly disposition of the French nation. I hope it will serve, in some like manner, to check any possible purport, really, from my own knowledge, (being the minister on the ground, and responsible for the truth of the declaration) that the treaty did not interfere with our engagements with this republic, but that, being a mere project, subject to rejection, &c. it ought not to be published, it would have been satisfactory. And had the communication been sent to me, I am satisfied it would have been much more acceptable to the persons who have seen it, and I am sure it would have been much more effectually such the effect. In any event, I had I gone further against his request, upon me, and not upon him, would the responsibility have rested. But this was not Mr. Jay's object. On the contrary, it is obvious that he wished me to compromise my character, and through use, that of the United States with this nation, upon the subject of the communication, and to place me in this Government or myself the least confidence in regard to it; and which I would not do, nor, in my opinion, ought I have done.

Whether this Government acted with propriety in asking for information upon the point in question, in a subject which I have nothing to do with. I am responsible only for the answer given by me to the request. My application to Mr. Jay was certainly not founded upon theirs to me: for I had contemplated it before theirs was received. I had then gained such an insight into their councils as to satisfy me that all our great national objects, so far as they were connected with this republic, were more easily to be secured by a frank and cordial deportment, than a cool and reserved one; that if we wished to preserve our neutrality with strict integrity, and avail ourselves at the same time of its fortunes, and without the least hazard on our part, in the negotiation with Spain, as likewise in that with England, (in case Mr. Jay's treaty was rejected) that this was the way to do it. In short, that, if it was necessary to gain the approbation of this Government to any thing in that treaty, which it would otherwise disapprove, that this was the way to do it. Nor can I see any condensation in such a line of conduct. On the contrary, between nations allied as we are, and especially when past and recent circumstances are considered, I deem it the most mag-

Sir:

My last letter, of March 8th, 1795, has been forwarded to you by duplicates. It will have anticipated the subject of your private letter of December 18th, 1795, though it is by no means so extensive as one which I should have concluded before this time, but for a constant round of interruptions, which I have not yet been able to repel. I am induced to write a few words about the most interesting object of the present communication to your Excellency, and the attention of which to a review of our relation to France, as may ascertain the facts, which is so firmly impressed upon me, that we have behaved to her fairly and honorably. For the present I shall say no more respecting the source of discontent of the treaty made by Mr. Jay, than this: that, as far as I have any definite ideas of treaties, offensive and defensive, I have no objection to it, for the reasons which I have expressed in the communication of the 18th ultimo. It was to express expressly saved; that France, from the circumstance of being the most favored nation, immediately inherits, upon equal terms, the concessions, indulgences, or conditions, made to other nations; and that the confining of its contents to the President and his committee, is not from too much delicacy. But the statesmen, in which the usages in such cases; not from an unwillingness that the Executive conduct should be canvassed, but from a certain fitness and expectation arising from such a diplomatic act.

The despatches which you are to understand to have reached my master of the concert which you have suggested. You will have been informed by my letter of the 8th ultimo, that "the step is viewed here as a very strong one," and, notwithstanding the rapid success which has attended the arms of our ally, we steadily direct our course to the character of neutrality which we profess, and, therefore, the more it is examined, the stronger it appears. You will hear from me shortly, in a more particular manner, concerning it, and the style of our negotiations at Paris, ought, in my judgment, to be observed. But I must be permitted to remark, that the inviolable policy of the President is, to be as independent as possible, of every nation upon earth; and this policy is not assumed now for the first time, when, perhaps, it may be insidiously breached by some, who lean to Great Britain, to prevent a tendency to Europe; but it is wise at all times, and, if steadily pursued, will protect our country from the effects of commotion in Europe. France, is, at this day, in the eye of the President, as she has always been, cordially embraced, and no event could be more afflicting to him than a suspicion of the purity of our motives in regard to that republic. But, without a steady adherence to principles, no Government can defend itself against the animadversions of the world, nor procure a permanent benefit to his own citizens.

Cases of spoliation and injury, according to the list subjoined, will accompany this letter, as subjects to which present intention and zeal are requested.

The prints, which have not been hitherto sent, are also prepared by Mr. Taylor.

Until a few days hence, I must beg you to accept this letter as the forerunner only of a more copious one, upon our affairs in France.

I am, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

From Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, April 14th, 1795.

Sir:

I was lately favored with a letter from Mr. Jay, of the 19th of February, by which I was informed that the bearer, Colonel Trumbull, who had copied and knew the contents of his treaty with the English Government, was instructed to communicate the same to me, because I was an American minister, and in which character it might be useful to me; but that I must receive it in strict confidence, and under an injunction to impart it to no other person whatever. As I had explicitly stated to Mr. Jay, in my letter by Mr. Parvin, the only terms upon which I would receive the information, and was told he had done, as well for the purpose of conveying an engagement with the committee, formed after the receipt of his first letter, and when I expected no further information from him on the subject, as of preventing the transmission of it in case it contained the slightest circumstance which might be objectionable here, I could not otherwise than be surprised by the contents of this letter. To withhold the communication for this purpose, as I was informed by the report of the contents of that treaty would excite a ferment here, and offer it, after the expiration of some months, and when it was expected from America, and upon terms upon which I had assured him I could not receive it, to say nothing of the impossibility of comprehending how it should be committed to me, as it was to be kept a profound secret, was unexpected. I think the more so, as I was always convinced, by the consistent, firm, and decided manner in which the public interest, it would unavoidably tend, in some respects, to subject me to additional embarrassment in my situation here. I was likewise soon apprized that Colonel Trumbull did not consider himself at liberty to make the communication in question, unless I asked for it; and by which it was understood that I bound myself to accept it on the terms proposed, adding thereby to the injunctures of Mr. Jay, the additional obligation of private stipulation. The dilemma, therefore, with which I was threatened, was of a peculiar kind: for, if I accepted and withheld the communication from the Government and our engagement with them, it was not only to the probable imputation of indiscretion, but likewise certainly to that of breach of promise. The line of propriety, however, appeared to me to be a plain one. I was bound to use such information as Mr. Jay might think fit to give me, in the best manner possible, according to my discretion, to promote the public interest; but I was not bound to use any artifice in obtaining that information, or to violate any engagement by the use of it. My duty to the public did not require this of me, and I had no other object to answer. As soon, therefore, as I had made a decision on the subject, I apprized Colonel Trumbull that I could not receive the communication proposed, upon the terms on which it was offered.
The mission of this gentleman here, though, according to my information of him, a worthy and a prudent man, produced an effect of a more serious kind. I was soon advised, by a person friendly to the United States, and herefore friendly and useful to me, that his arrival had excited uneasiness in the public councils, and would probably create considerable disagreement among them. It was believed, however, on good authority, that no impeachment of him would be made for the foreign relations, no account of the contents of that treaty: for it would hardly be credited, after this, considering the relation between Mr. Jay and myself, that I knew nothing of those contents. Upon what other motive, it would be asked, was the appointment of Mr. Beauclerk to be expected from such a direction, would be deemed a fallacious one? He added, that the wisest precautions were necessary, on my part guard me against any unjust imputation; since, through that, the interest of my country might, at the present crisis, be essentially wounded.

As I had anticipated, in some measure, the effect, I was mortified, but not surprised, by the intelligence. It was curious, however, but how should it have surprised me, to have to make a private as public character, to place the integrity of my own conduct upon which could not be questioned. There appeared to me to be but one mode by which this could be done, and which was by making known to the committee what had passed between Mr. Jay and myself to state the terms upon which he had offered the communication, and how far he had been understood from me to acknowledge the execution, so as to down which, was a painful task; but as I had no other alternative left, but that of exposing myself to the suspicion of having known, from the beginning, the purport of Mr. Jay's treaty, and uniting with him in withholding it from them, who, 1 sincerely believed, would have been the surest means to support the honor of my country. In consequence, I waited on the members of the committee, and made the representation as above, repeating Mr. Jay's motive for withholding the communication, as urged by himself: "That it belonged to the sovereign power alone to make it." &c. It was replied that it could not otherwise than excite uneasiness in the councils of the United States. In the state of the foreign power, in particular, America had stepped forward and made a treaty with that Power, the contents of which were so carefully and strictly withheld from this Government; for, if the treaty was not injurious to France, why was it withheld from her? Was it prudent for one ally to act in such a manner in regard to another, and, especially, under the present circumstances, and at the present time, as to excite suspicions of the kind in question? I assured them, generally, as I had done before, that I was satisfied the treaty contained in it nothing which could give them uneasiness; but if it did, and especially if it weakened our connexion with France, it would certainly be dissolved in the course of the present commission, assured me they wished me to put myself in no dilemma which would be embarrassing, and thus the conference ended.

A few days after this, I was favored with a letter from Mr. Hitchborn, an American gentleman of character here, (from Massachusetts) of which I enclose you a copy, stating the contents or outlines of the treaty in question, as communicated to me by Mr. Colon. I am now writing to state the information of this Government. I was surprised at the incident; because I could not suppose that Colonel Trumbull would take this step, or any other, without the instructions of Mr. Jay, and it seemed to me extraordinary that Mr. Jay should give such an instruction, or mark, to his personal representative. Colonel Trumbull would confide the purport of the treaty to Mr. Hitchborn, for he merited the confidence, but I was surprised that Mr. Jay should write me it is to be communicated to me only as a public minister, &c. to be imparted to no one else, and that Colonel Trumbull, however deeply impressed he might be after his arrival here with the propriety of keeping the contents of this treaty a secret, did not think it his duty to impart them to me. It seemed as though, to communicate the same to a third person, to be communicated to me, under no injunction whatever. I was, however, possessed of the paper in question; and it was my duty to turn it to the best account, for the public interest, that circumstances would now admit of. It was, it true, the most informal of all informal communications, and one of confidential character. I opened the letter with the usual form of expression, in which the information was given me, that Colonel Trumbull would make the paper confidential, to a third person, and I therefore thought it my duty to open it myself. After transcribing the letter, I communicated it to the members, on my part, that they might confide in the credibility of the parties. The paper was presented to Mr. Merlin de Donay, with the comment suggested; and since which, I have neither heard from the committee, Colonel Trumbull, nor Mr. Jay, on the subject.

I intimated to you in my last that I was persuaded, if there was a force here and willing to make head against the Revolution, it would soon show itself, but that I was of opinion none such existed. This presage has been since verified by a great and interesting example. The storm, which I thought I saw gathering, after rising to its being a mere tempest, is now seen to be a hurricane. Its strength being changed, its manner of acting any mischance. On the contrary, I am inclined to believe, from present appearances, it will be productive of good.

It was natural to expect that the trial of Barrere, Collot d'Herbois, and Billaud de Varennes, three men, who were, in the early stages, the associates, and, in the latter, in some degree, the advocates of Robespierre, would create the most important excitement of the moment. It would excite some ferment. It was equally natural to expect that, if that party was not so completely crushed as to preclude all hope of success, it would, in some stage of the proceeding, make an extraordinary effort to preserve them. The epoch of this trial was, therefore, determined; but there was an important point, and on several stages were marked by circumstances which tended rather to increase than diminish the general solicitude.

Under the banner of this party, and apparently in favor of the acquisit of these members, the discontented, of every description, were seen rallying forming, in the whole, an extraordinary assemblage, being gathered from the various, and, heretofore, opposite classes of society, but united now for the common purpose of disturbing the public tranquility. The prisons, which were filled in the time of Robespierre, and opened under the more humane administration of the present day, had discharged upon the city an immense crowd of the ancient aristocracy, and who some years ago, that the severe discipline which had undergone had not deprecated the public safety were required under the reign of the ancient court. As the present administration had rescued them from the guillotine, and to which they were otherwise inevitably doomed, it was at least entitled to their gratitude. This slight tribute, however, was not paid for that important service. On the contrary, these were among the most active in forwarding the proceedings. The operations of the other parties, as of the former, the peasants, the dispossessed, the bondmen, the defrocked, the dispossessed, or rather routed, Jacobins and their adherents, were seen marshalled by its side, and acting in harmony with it. These two classes of people, and those who were heretofore at endless war with each other, now combined, formed a force of some strength, and excited, in the minds of many well disposed persons, serious apprehensions for the safety.

The increasing scarcity of bread, and which menaced an unavoidable diminution of the ordinary allowance, contributed much to increase the apprehension of danger. A deficiency in this article in Paris, under the ancient go gernment, was accounted a cause of public insurrection, to guard against such deficiency as the greatest of public calamities. Abundant stores were, in consequence, when it was possible to provide them; and, let the scarcity or price be what it might, in other quarters, the ordinary allowance, and nearly at the ordinary price, was distributed, as in times of greatest plenty, instead of abating, which would have been the practice, in the reign of the ancient court. As the state of affairs, which announced the approach of a deficiency, announced likewise that of a crisis extremely important in the history of the Revolution. The most firm knew it was an experiment yet to be made, and from which they ex to expect no possible benefit, it was thought by many, as it was at least entertained, that it was to be foreseen that, that was not a government which could remain, for whose duty it was to sustain it, that of yielding under, or meeting it, with firmness, and passing through it as well as possible.
FRANCE.

As soon as it was known that a diminution of the ordinary allowance was unavoidable, it was resolved to make it a maxim that, in every case, they might not be taken by surprise; and for this purpose, Bossy d'Anglas, of the section of subsistence in the committee of public safety, appeared at the tribune some days before it took effect. His discourse, which was short but explicit, began by exposing freely the enormities and vicious arrangements of the ancient committees; whereby, he said, France had already been very often saved from great calamities. There was no name even familiar was likewise proceeding from that source, which neither the wisdom, nor the industry of the present councils had been able altogether to avert. That he was happy, however, to assure the Convention that, as the most prudent measures were long since taken to correct the abuses of old, there would be for a future time, and for this purpose, a congress called at Paris, and presided over by Barrere, Billant de Varennes, &c., and by the members of the Mountain party in general, with a smile of approbation. It was obvious they considered Bossy as a welcome messenger, announcing to them joyful tidings. A few days afterwards the deficiency so much dreaded took place, and, at the same time, the intrigues of the discordant were fully to be deplored. The movement was commenced by about four hundred citizens from a section heretofore noted for its turbulence; and who, appearing without the hall, demanded admission to the bar of the Convention. 'A deputation from the party, composed of those who assembled, was sent to the former for the purpose of having their request understood, and, declaring that they were on the point of regretting the sacrifices they had made to the Revolution. The answer of the President (Thibaudant) was firm and decisive. To that part of the address which complained of the scarcity of bread, he replied by stating the measures of the Government to remedy it; but, with reference to that part of the deputation which was about to adopt measures to prevent indecency, he could observe that, if the disaffected were at work to excite trouble, but that their efforts would be fruitless: for, enlightened by experience, and strong in the power of the whole nation, the Convention would be able to control their movements; and, in closing, he addressed himself more particularly to the memorialists, saying that the efforts of the people to recover their liberty would not be lost whilst good citizens seconded the labors of their representatives; that despair belonged only to slaves; freemen never regretted the sacrifices they had made in such a cause. The answer, which was received with general applause, checked for a while the turbulent spirit of the disaffected.

At six o'clock the adjournment was made, and the sitting was abandoned at this stage. About a month after this, and which was on the 1st of April, (13 Germinal) a more numerous body, consisting principally of workmen from the Faubourg of St. Antoine, presented itself likewise before the hall, demanding admission to the bar of the Convention and, upon some pretext, and in violation of the usual forms, immediately entered, from a crowd in which, in the presence of that assemblage, there were in the hall perhaps three or four thousand, and, in the vacant external space around it, as many more. The proceedings of the Convention were suspended: the president, however, and the members, kept their seats, declaring that, as their sitting was violated, they would do no business. Indeed it was now impossible to do any; but the Convention was practically a substitute for any national representation. The liberty of the fathers, "liberty to the patriots," meaning some of the accomplices of Robespierre, could alone be heard. They continued thus in the hall about four hours, from two to six in the evening, offering, in the interim, no violence to any of the members of the Convention. Wherever the passions of the multitude were seen which caused a suspicion that a good understanding subsisted between the leaders of the mob and some members of the Mountain party; it was likewise observed that their final retreat was made upon a suggestion from that quarter: for, as soon as an adjournment to that effect was given from that quarter, it was obeyed. Many bloody and tumultuous passions were spread over the whole city, and either murder them in their places, or send them to prison, to be murdered afterwards, under the form of a trial: as was the case in the time of Robespierre; whereby the preponderating scale would be shifted to the other side, and the reign of terror revive again for a while. Be the plan, however, what it might, it was soon frustrated: for, as the multitude, observing the operations of the committee, its irregular and denunciation of disorders and chief to lead it on to acts of violence: the time was therefore whirled away in senseless uproar, till, at length, the speculative authors of the movement were uneasy about the issue, and as anxious to get rid of it, as those at whom it was supposed to be pointed. In the interim, too, the means that were adopted without, tended not only to secure the general tranquillity of the city, but most probably to influence, in a great measure, the proceedings within. By order of the committees, the tocsin was sounded, and the citizens in every section called to arms so that the appeal was fairly made to the people of Paris, whether they would support the republic, or rally under the standard of those who would destroy it. The appeal was repeated: for, in order to assert the new rights and duties, it was obeyed. The lapse of a few hours gave it the preponderance, and the lapse of a few more not only freed the hall of the Convention from the invasion with which it had been seized, but dispersed the crowd from its rear. At six in the evening the Convention resumed its deliberations, beginning by declaring its sitting permanent, and progressing by a review of the movements of the day, which were well understood, and freely discussed. By this time, it was fortified by accounts from every quarter that the sense of the city was decisively pronounced in its favor, and the absence of those who were not then returning to their duty. The sitting continued until six in the morning, in the course whereof a decree of banishment was passed against the accused members, and of arrestation against eight or nine of the Mountain party; which latter list was afterwards increased to about eighteen; and both of which decrees have since been carried into effect, by sending the former to the island of Oleron, and the latter to the castle of Ham, in the department of Somme; and thus ended the commotion which was so long gathering, and which menaced, at one time, not to arrest the progress of the Revolution, (at least such was my opinion) but to occasion much trouble, and stain its page with new atrocities. In the course of this day, the services of General Pichegru, who happened to be in Paris, and was appointed commandant of the national guard, who of great importance to his country. His activity was great, for he was always on horse, and passing from one city to another of his arrangements in disposing of the cannon and military force were wise. His name too was of great utility, for it tended equally to elevate the hopes of the multitude and to secure the tranquillity and prosperity of France. The fate of its late antagonist, if there was no other motive, and which was precipitated by the glory of France, and of all the nations of league against the French republic, must furnish a solemn and lasting admonition to shun its example. The opposite principles, too, upon which it is founded, being the average of the sober and the wise, at variance with the extreme exaltation, and the sectaries of anarchy, whose partisans were lately combined in an effort to crush it, promises to secure in its measures some stability in the observance of those just and honorable principles which it professes.

Before the time passed, the views of our party succeeded, of the establishment of the constitution, and some motions that have been adopted were now depending before select committees, appointed to prepare the several organic laws necessary to introduce. An opinion is likewise entertained by many that the constitution in question is very defective, and ought to be amended before it is put in force. A discourse to this effect was lately delivered by Pichegru, a respectable and well informed member, and he said that some sentiments were then avowed by others. But whether it shall be an attempt of this kind (should it be formally made) will succeed, or whether the general solicitude to put the constitution in force, however defective it may be, in the hope of amending it afterwards, will prevail, is yet uncertain.
Since the fortunate issue of the late commotion, a treaty of peace was concluded with Prussia, at Baden, in Switzerland, of which I enclose you a copy.

The import of the fourth and fifth articles gives cause to suspect that some stipulations exist which have not been communicated, and it is believed by many that it is agreed between the parties that France shall retain the Prussian territory on the left of the Rhine, in lieu whereof she is to take and cede certain lands on the right bank; but this is but a step in raising the latter points; they have been arranged as a party on the side of France.

The latter considers the old connexion with Austria as broken, and wishes to supply it by one with Prussia; and, provided satisfactory arrangements are, or shall be hereafter, formed for that purpose, he is prepared to yield the point here involved.

The negotiation with Spain is also said to be far advanced, and will most probably soon be closed. It is likewise reported that a person, or more than one, from England, is now in Paris, upon the pretext of treating for an exchange of prisoners, but, in truth, for the more substantial one of treating, or at least of sounding the disposition of the French Government for peace. Upon this point, however, I hope to be able to give you, in the course of a few days, more certain information than I now can.

From Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, May 17, 1796.

Sir: I was yesterday honored with yours of the 8th of March, the only one received since that of the 5th of December, and was at the same moment favored with the company of Mr. Pitcairn, who, having just arrived, had called to present his commission of vice-consul for this city, to be recognized as such.

I informed you in my letter of the 6th of March, and for reasons that were in part before explained, that the arrival of this gentleman would subject me to an unpleasant dilemma: for, if it was known he was a British subject, although he had likewise become an American citizen, I doubted much whether he would be received. That, in strict propriety, I ought to communicate the fact, if it was so; for, after what had passed between us, upon a subject of this nature, an announcement of this kind would have tended to prejudice myself to the imputation of want of candor, and that, in any event, if he were established, however correctly I might personally act, the circumstance of his being a British subject, would not only lessen his weight, and, to a certain degree, and from causes that are obvious, lessen mine likewise. The manner in which might be presented for the sake of a personal form, and without any regard to its importance.

By his arrival, therefore, this embarrassment was realized. The commission of the President is the law to me, and, upon every principle it is disagreeable to suspend its force; but yet the nature of the trust reposed in a public minister seems to imply in him a discretionary power to control, according to his judgment, incidents of this kind, if thought expedient, for the purpose of dispensing the necessary duties when necessary to prevent a public detriment. Upon mature consideration, therefore, I have thought it best to withhold the official communication of his appointment from the Government, until I should hear from you in reply to your letter, and the more especially, as it might now have affected in the course of a few weeks. In consequence of this communication to Mr. Pitcairn, with the motives upon which it was founded, and was pleased to observe that he appeared to be perfectly satisfied with the propriety of it.

I observe, by this letter, that the treaty concluded by Mr. Jay with Great Britain did not survive the 5th of March; and, as I am fully assured that Mr. Jay was, by the orders of his Government, authorized to carry things so far, and to have himself kept secret. I regret equally this delay and secrecy: the delay, because, if it is not approved, it may become more difficult, in the probable course of events, on this side the Atlantic, to obtain a remodification of it; and the secrecy, because the jealousy that was at first imbued by this Government of its contents, will of course remain for the same space of time; and that, instead of being shared, it will be secreted by us.

Having too explained the object of this mission, whilst its issue was uncertain, they think it strange that the result should be now withheld. Upon this point, however, I have nothing new to add. I have already communicated to you, in my last, whatever I had to communicate upon this subject, and you will now have in my present communication, full assurance to inspire this Government with a confidence, either that the treaty in question contains in it nothing improper, or that it will not be ratified in case it does.

Your last letter gave me the first intelligence upon which I could rely that Colonel Humphreys was in America. But, your account is so fully consistent with what we had heard, and with our views in respect to the practical interests on the American coast, that I was assured you, long since, that it would be easy to obtain from this Government its aid upon that point, and it is certain that its aid with each, and especially Algiers, where it is to the strictest of France, would be of no small advantage to this country. France is at war against Austria, Spain, England, Portugal, and in fact, against them all, and, in consequence, conclude that she will be powerless than all united, and regard her accordingly.

I have frequently been told, in private conversation, by the members of the committee, that they were ready to render us all the service in their power in that respect; and I should long since have requested the Government to make our peace there. In pursuance of the plan commenced by Mr. Morris, I had not been instrusted to this form, the hands of Colonel Humphreys, and feared, by such interference, that I should embarrass the views and measures of our Government. I shall be ready, however, to act in whatever line you may think proper to direct, and shall endeavor, and without any particular compromization on our part, to keep the committee in the same state of preparation.

In general, our commercial affairs progress as well, all things considered, as could be expected. Transactions of old standing, I have not lately formally pressed, because I knew that the Government was embarrassed on the score of finance, and because I thought it better to wait the issue of the business depending, with you in June next. Mr. Skipwith, however, does every thing in his power to forward those objects, and perhaps with as much effect as would be possible under any pressure that could now be made. But, in the direct or current commerce, our countrymen enjoy all the privileges that the Government can give them; and though delays are sometimes experienced, they are not of such magnitude as to prevent the practice of the most essential interests.

I have long been acquainted with Colonel Humphreys, and that ought to be understood at the treasury. I omitted it in my more early applications to this Government, because I wished to progress with the greater objects first, and more latterly for the reasons above suggested. I conferred, however, on the subject with Mr. Adet, and presume he will allow it as a thing of course; but, if he does not, upon notification thereof to the committee, and which I will immediately make when so advised by you, he will certainly be instructed to do it.

Since my last, Paris, and the republic in general, have enjoyed a state of perfect tranquillity. Every little disturbance, which ensued for a time the movement of the 28th of July (12th of French Calendar), and there was not, or two of the smaller kind which did ensue, subsided almost of itself, and in each instance without force, and of course without bloodshed. Thus the authority of the Convention prevails, although it is supported by the common sense and the common interest of the citizens of Paris only; a thing deemed heretofore impracticable under existing embarrassments. Certain it is, that, if the Government had been in the hands of a King, or any other description of person, and that of the people themselves, we should have seen, in the course of a few weeks past, a succession of many revolutions of the ministerial kind, and which would have, perhaps, dethroned eventually any king that ever reigned here. The distress of the people, on account of the scarcity of bread, since that time, has been like that of a besieged town.
They have been constantly upon allowance, and which was latterly reduced to two ounces, and sometimes less, per day. My family, which consists of fourteen persons, is allowed two half ounces, but this is not enough, especially the poor: for at a great expense (nearly forty dollars specie per barrel) I am supplied. The accounts which we have of the distress of the aged, the infirm, and even of children, are most affecting; yet calmsness and serenity are seen everywhere, complaints diminish, and that ferocity which was so prevalent of late has been cut off; and the senate and convention, when they were excited by the animosity of contending parties, and most probably increased by foreign influence, has entirely disappeared. In this moment they all look to America for bread, and most fervently do I join them in prayer that our countrymen may speedily bring it to them. If they can make out for six weeks, they are safe: for by that time their crops will be grown, from present prospects, they may be in a better situation in the interim than they now are, and most probably not in a worse.

In the line of negotiation, nothing has been concluded since the treaty with Prussia, and which was ratified by both parties soon after it was signed, Sir F. Robartes to Rochefort, from whence he attended his arrival to the under guard until the arrival of an agent from the committee, who was instructed to receive and report his propositions to that body, provided they embraced any other object than an exchange of prisoners; but in case they did not, he was directed to receive and report his propositions as to the means of settling the accounts, and to treat for an exchange of prisoners. Have you no other power? Let us settle this point first; we shall be together, and may afterwards talk on what we please. But have you no other power? Your answer to this question may settle this and every other point in a word; if you have, I will receive what you will communicate; if you have not, our business is at an end. Mr. Eden replied, he had none, and that they parted, the agent for Paris, and Mr. Eden for London; the latter being apprised what the wish of the committee was in that respect.

It is said that a treaty is lately concluded with the commissioners from Holland, by which the independence of that country is acknowledged, and an alliance offensive and defensive formed, upon terms which promise to be satisfactory to the parties. I will enclose a sketch of these, which has been published.

General Pichegru has crossed the Rhine, and with a considerable force; but probably, at present, for the purpose only of quartering his army in the enemy's country. He is now in the neighborhood of Mayence, which is still besieged; and the French have been as fairly quartered as the soldiers of the late Dutch, that against whom in the empire the forces of the republic will be directed; for the door which was opened to receive propositions from the princes of the Germanic body, through the King of Prussia, was not an idle provision. Advantage, I am told, has already been taken of it; and that it will most probably prove the means, and to the credit and interest of the republic, of obtaining the views of the great and good men of the empire.

The negotiation with Spain is still at a stand. The Spanish court is strongly inclined to connect itself with this republic, but, in so doing, it foresees the necessity of an accommodation with us in respect to the boundaries and the Missisipi; and, indeed, would have been desirous of settling that, before they would give any other effect. Of the views of England, however, Spain is, and always was, jealous; so that it is not improbable an accommodation may soon take place. It is said that the King of Spain makes a provision for the children of the late King, the object of his care; that he wishes to have them delivered up to him, with the view of giving them an establishment in property somewhere in his dominions, with the title of duke to the boy, and that this point, in some form or other, will probably be agreed.

At sea, in the excursions which were made in the course of the winter, by tempest, great loss was sustained; and considerable of the same will hereafter be directed principally against England, and less attention was for some time paid to the navy than ought to have been expected. At present, however, the attention of the executive branch seems to be turned more towards that object than heretofore; so that it is probable the waste of the winter will soon be repaired.

The arguments continue to depreciate, and the frequent discussions which take place upon the various propositions made to raise their credit, always produce the opposite effect, of depressing them. Many think, however, the depreciation a blessing to the country, and that their total fall would be among the happiest of political events, especially if they can be kept up through the summer. At present, their depreciation is by the standard of gold, or foreign exchange, as four to one.

The mass of wealth in national domains is affirmed, by those who ought to know, more than double what I suppose; being, after restoring the property of those who were illegally condemned, according to a late decree, about four hundred millions sterling. A deputation was lately sent to Holland of Sieges and Reuvel, to press for money; and it is expected they will succeed, at least in such degree as to answer present exigencies.

I am happy to hear that the President approves my conduct in the instance mentioned; and I beg you to assure him, that, for the future, I shall continue to be neither less attentive nor assiduous in the discharge of the duties of the trust committed to me, than I have hitherto been.

P.S. Since writing the above, I was informed personally by one of the agents who attended Mr. Eden at Dieppe, that he (Mr. Eden) had power to treat on other subjects than that of an exchange of prisoners, and that he not only communicated this, but he made his propositions, and which were accepted, provisionally, upon the understanding given Mr. Eden, that he was politic and acceptable, and with which he appeared to be perfectly satisfied. What the propositions were, I know not; but that they contemplated peace cannot be doubted.

From the Secretary of State of the United States to Mr. Monroe.

June 1st, 1795.

Sir:

The uneasiness which has been discovered by the French republic, in reference to our late treaty with Great Britain, appears to be founded in your instructions, in which you are directed to maintain an honorable interchange of information between the United States and France, have determined me to review our conduct from the commencement of the present war. In it I shall unreservedly expose the policy of the Executive, as it may be collected from the documents of this Department that the imputation of an attempted deception in property somewhere in his dominions, with the title of duke to the boy; and that this point, in some form or other, will probably be agreed.

From the Secretary of State of the United States to Mr. Monroe.

June 1st, 1795.

Sir:

The uneasiness which has been discovered by the French republic, in reference to our late treaty with Great Britain, appears to be founded in your instructions, in which you are directed to maintain an honorable interchange of information between the United States and France, have determined me to review our conduct from the commencement of the present war. In it I shall unreservedly expose the policy of the Executive, as it may be collected from the documents of this Department that the imputation of an attempted deception in property somewhere in his dominions, with the title of duke to the boy; and that this point, in some form or other, will probably be agreed.

P.S. Since writing the above, I was informed personally by one of the agents who attended Mr. Eden at Dieppe, that he (Mr. Eden) had power to treat on other subjects than that of an exchange of prisoners, and that he not only communicated this, but he made his propositions, and which were accepted, provisionally, upon the understanding given Mr. Eden, that he was politic and acceptable, and with which he appeared to be perfectly satisfied. What the propositions were, I know not; but that they contemplated peace cannot be doubted.
Immediately upon this event "only one opinion prevailed as to the badness of the constitution." No plan of a new constitution was even reported for a considerable time afterward; none was adopted for many months. At this instant the proposed permanent system is locked up from operation; but what the permanent system will really be is unknown. It can only be seen in the future.

If, instead of searching for the will of the people, the politics of the reigning parties had been consulted, how transitory were they! Administrations were hourly passing away. Every member of Government was engaged in the defense of some other than that of his neighbor. The Jacobins were busy in exciting tumults. The Convention were privately calling for guards to protect themselves from the people. The very ministers declared that the National Assembly could be brought into no kind of consistency. A national bankruptcy, and a difficulty of supplies, were too much to be apprehended. Strong symptoms of anarchy; the shedding of blood; and information that the questions between absolute monarchy and a republic must be decided by forces; were prophetic of some great catastrophe.

Examine next the external relations of France. The foreign ministers, except the minister of the United States, had fled. The alliances against her were multiplying; the enemy numerous; their object to erect a military government in all the British, and to give the British armament of the French; and the affections of the French people not decisively directed to any specific object. If the United States had panted for war as much as ancient Rome; if its armies had been as effective as those of Prussia; if their coffer had been full, and their debts annihilated, even yet the peace was too precious to be risked for the most flimsy issue of war. A partial motive disdained us from war, so were we without an obligation to enter into it as a party.

No casus foederis had arisen upon our alliance with France. We had not, nor have we yet, been required to execute the guarantees; and, therefore, it was unnecessary to speak concerning it.

Had we indulged our sensibility for the cries languishing over France, and associated our injuries with hers, the rashness of the step would have been proverbial. An infant country, deep in debt necessitated to borrow in Europe; without manufactures; without a land or naval forces; without a competency of arms or armament; with a commerce closely connected beyond the Atlantic, with a certainty of enhancing the price of foreign productions, and diminishing that of our own; with a constitution little more than four years old; in a state of production, and not exempt from foes; such a country can have no greater curse in store for her than war. That peace was our policy has been admitted by Congress, by the People, and by France herself. France could not have thought otherwise: for, had we been active, she would have been deprived of our provisions except by snatches, and our payments to her in the provinces would have been interrupted.

The proclamation of neutrality, therefore, which was our first important act, after the eruption of the war, deserved to be the model of our subsequent conduct.

After the downfall of the President of the United States, if he departed not from the line prescribed by the proclamation, was no small indication of his being resolved to cultivate a friendship with the new republic. Mr. Genet came over as minister, upon the death of Louis XVI. He was the protege of a party whose downfall had been predicted from Paris in August, 1792; and it was not improbable that some of the neutral Powers would endeavor to inculcate an opinion of the influence of the American Republic in France. Mr. Genet had been Chief Magistrate, who had been the organ of the general will when they were formed. But what said the President? Did he waive in recognizing them as compacts with the French nation? Did he affect delays? Was he eager to seize a pretext from the dismembering of Mr. Genet near the Southern extremity of our continent, and to increase the weight of his own influence? No, sir; Mr. Genet was received without a previous inquiry; without a qualification or condition; immediately; and with an indifference to the murmurs of the belligerent Powers. For our minister had been before instructed that "it always behooved us to acknowledge any government to be rightful, which is formed by the will of the nation, substantially declared."

A few days brought forth a third decree of the government in our relation to France. He "communicated the decree of the National Convention, of February 19th, 1793, authorizing the French Executive to propose a treaty with the United States, of a principle and objects, which might strengthen the power of the United States, and which unite the two nations; and informed us, in a letter of May 33d, 1793, that he was authorized to treat accordingly."

I really doubt whether, upon this head, the French republic, if left to herself, would utter one remonstrance. But party, which, if it be not abolished, must be the bane of the Union, fights under the popular banners of France, exasperating and aggravating and overthrowing its adversary by propagating a belief that she has been ill treated. These calumnies cannot be more effectually faced than by examining the commercial relations already subsisting by treaty between the United States and France.

But the treaty of the two countries was placed, among other things, upon the following grounds:

1st. Both parties "engage mutually not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same favor, freely, if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional."

2d. The French were to pay in our ports, &c. no other or greater duties or imposts than those which the nations most immediately near to them exact; that is, they shall equally pay the duties on goods, navigation, and commerce, whether in passing from one port in the United States to another, or in going to and from the same, from and to any part of the world, which the said nations do or shall enjoy.

3d. The Americans were to enjoy the same privileges in the French ports in Europe. In this is included an exemption of one hundred sols per ton, established in France on enemy ships, unless their ships shall load with the merchandise of France for another port in the same dominion; they are then to pay the duty above mentioned, so long as other nations, the most favored, shall be obliged to pay it; the United States being at liberty to establish an equivalent duty in the same case.

4th. "Free ships were to give freedom to goods."

5th. American or French property on board of enemy ships was confiscable.

6th. Regulations were made for contraband, and the carrying on of war by either against its enemies, so as to prevent both to the other.

7th. The Americans were to have one or more free ports granted to them in Europe, for bringing and disposing of their merchandise; and the free ports, which had been, at the date of the treaty, (May 6th, 1787) and were then, open to the merchants of America, were continued to the American vessels in the French West Indies, and our salt fish paid there a weighty duty: And

5th. That our own carriage of our own tobacco was heavily duties in France.

The subjunctive extracts from letters of this Department to our minister in Paris, on the 22d of January, 10th of March, 28th of April, 16th of June, 1792, and on the 19th of March, 1793, bespeak our earnestness for an extension of our commercial privileges.

For Additional Extracts.

January 25.—"I feel myself particularly bound to recommend, as the most important of your charges, the patronage of our commerce and the extension of its privileges, both in France and her colonies; but more especially the latter."

March 10.—"We had expected, ere this, that, in consequence of the recommendation of their predecessors, some overtures would have been made to us on the subject of a treaty of commerce; an authentic copy of the recommenation was delivered, but nothing said about carrying it into effect. Perhaps they expect that we should declare our readiness to meet them on the ground of treaty; if they do, we have no hesitation to declare it. In the mean time, if the present communications produce no satisfaction, we may furnish a good occasion to endeavor to have matters replaced in statu quo, by repealing the late innovations as to our ships, tobacco, and whale oil. It is right that things should be kept foot to foot.

Mr. Jefferson: April 28. — I hope that these manifestations of friendly dispositions towards that country will induce them to remove the very obnoxious laws respecting our commerce, which were passed by the preceding National Assembly. The present session of Congress will pass, I venture to think, any other laws as detrimental to our friendly dispositions before the present administration can produce a retaliation of good on their part, a retaliation of commerce to themselves and us.

It will be impossible to defer, longer than the next session of Congress, some counter regulations for the protection of our navigation and commerce. I must intreat you, therefore, to avail yourself of every occasion of immediate advantage in this respect on this subject. If they wish an equal and cordial treaty with us, we are ready to enter into it. We would wish that this could be the scene of negotiation, from considerations suggested by the nature of our Government, which will readily occur to you.

June 16. — With respect to the particular objects of commerce susceptible of being placed on a better footing, on the recent measures of the Jansenists, in France and England, that with France is stated as it stood at the time I left that country, when the only objects wherein change was still desirable, were those of salted provisions, tobacco, and tar, pitch, and turpentine. The first was in negotiation when I came away, and was pursued by Mr. S. until his successor's illness, till their general condemnation to that branch of their commerce, to other articles. Our commercial intercourse with the West Indies had never admitted amelioration during my stay in France. The temper of that period did not allow even the essay; and it was as much as we could do to hold the ground given us by the marshal de Castries' arrest, admitting us to their colonies with salted provisions, &c. As to both these branches of commerce, to wit, with France and her colonies, we have hoped they will pursue their own proposition of arranging them by treaty, and that we could draw that treaty to this place. There is no other where the dependence of their colonies on our States for their prosperity is so obvious as here; nor where their negotiator would feel it so much. But it would be possible, if the measure of the new Ministry was to the re-establishment of our commerce with France, on the footing on which it was at the beginning of their Revolution. That treaty may be long on the anvil; in the mean time, we cannot submit to the late innovations without taking measures to do justice to our own navigation. This object, therefore, is pursued while you will be able to form a plan; the object of it will be, you will have the opportunity of passing such a treaty in another form than that which has been proposed. I hope you will have nothing favorable on your arrival in France, when Mr. Claviere was in the ministry, and the dispositions of the National Assembly favorable to the ministers.

Mutual good offices, mutual affection, and similar principles of Government, seem to deserve the two nations for the most intimate composition; and I cannot too much press it on you to improve every opportunity which may occur in the changeable scenes which are passing, and to seize them as they occur, for placing our commerce with that nation and its dependencies on the freest and most encouraging footing possible.

What were the corresponding efforts of our minister relative to a treaty of commerce? In June, 1789, he was instructed to Mr. Jefferson, in a note of May 17th, 1792, that he should return from the instructions in the same manner he had been instructed in the same way. I shall, however, fail in my duty towards my nation, sir, and I should offer but a feeble testimony of theattachment which I have for so many years vowed to it, if I were to dissemble the discontent, which the decrees of the constituent assembly, infringing the system of commerce established between France and the United States, before the year 1789, have excited in America. I forego all remarks on that subject, because I leave it to your wisdom and the sentiments of your nation; and I dare believe, that, even if it concerned merely its own interests, the National Assembly would no longer suffer regulations to exist which fall still harder upon the French consumers than upon their manufacturers. I allude, sir, to the object, sir, to the wishes of those who have doubt, pay all the attention that its importance deserves. The constituent assembly expressed its desire that the King should negotiate a new commercial treaty with America. It has been communicated to the President of the United States, by the minister plenipotentiary of His Majesty. But this project has until now been without effect. I am directed to assure you, sir, that my government is not without real pleasure at the idea of a new and lasting establishment of commerce between America and that part of the world, the most friendly dispositions. You will give me very great pleasure, sir, when you shall please to authorize me to write that he is entrusted with that business.

July 33d, 1792. — I shall likewise lay before you the desire which the American Government expresses to establish the union of the two people, by a new treaty of commerce, and I shall immediately take the orders of the King for commencing that important negotiation, I do not doubt but it will soon be brought to a happy conclusion, since the two Governments are equally desirous of establishing the new treaty on the basis of the strictest justice, and consequently, of the most reciprocal advantage of both people.

On the 13th of February, 1793, we were informed by our minister, that, he having been instructed to transfer the negotiation of a new treaty of commerce to America, the thing wished was done; and that we may treat in August, 1792.

Mr. Genet's abovementioned letter of the 33d of May, 1792, enclosing the decree of February 19th, 1792, concluded in these words: "The obstacles raised with intentions hostile to liberty, by the preludious ministers of despotism, the obstacles, whose object was to stop the rapid progress of the commerce of the Americans, and the extension of the territory of the new States in the world, are, in the space of a few years, more than doubled. The latest regulations, if not the most stringent, which the people at the two sides of the mountains have seen, have been recorded to be called by all the names which their situation enjoys in her vast possessions; has invited them to participate the benefits of her navigation, in granting to their vessels the same privileges as those of our Government, that is, in a national compact, the liberal and fraternal basis on which she wishes to see raised the commercial and political system of both People; all whose interests are confounded.

I am invested, sir, with the powers necessary to undertake this important negotiation, of which the sad annals of humanity are not replete before the brilliant era of the American Republic. This important task has been intrusted to you. Henceforward, I am determined to establish a treaty, that is, in a national compact, the liberal and fraternal basis on which she wishes to see raised the commercial and political system of both People; all whose interests are confounded.

I find no answer to this letter from Mr. Jefferson; and be notices the steps which were taken in consequence of the fact that only in his letter to Mr. Morris, on the 33d of August, 1793, thus: "The Senate being then (33d May, 1793) in recess, and not to meet again till the 2d of August, 1793. The President, therefore, established a new stage of treaty, given by the King in that negotiation, he was more on the part of our Government, would, of course, delay any definitive answer to this friendly proposition. As he was sensible of this circumstance, he has been understood to lie over till the meeting of the Senate.
Upon this conduct of Mr. Jefferson, inviolate comments have been circulated; and it has been prevented into a testimony of our evasion, and of our disaffections to France, with a design to foment discussions between the two republics. Your exertions will doubtless frustrate the evil purpose.

I can not hope from the present state of the regulations of commerce; suffering, in the mean time, severities from her commercial regulations. Can any rational man believe, when he reads the preceding confidential letters from the Department of State to our minister in Paris, that they were fabricated to deceive? Deception must have been under no circumstances the design. The powers of the minister authorized for the execution of this treaty on our part, in the profession of a desire to improve the treaty, what culpable cause can be assigned for repelling an immediate negotiation? Were we looking for an adverse stroke to the affairs of France, in order to squeeze out greater commercial indulgencies? We have been charmed by Great Britain with too lively a sympathy with her success, to wish any material improvement in her commerce. But of the confidence entertained, and the confidential opinions upon this occasion. But the President came to an instantaneous decision, by receiving Mr. Genet in the face of the war with Great Britain; recognizing the treaties, continuing to pay our debt to France; accommodating her with money by pecuniary aid. Had the cause of republicanism any connexion with a change in the treaty of commerce, the President's remainder of it, without the protest of our minister, would have been a proof of a leaning towards England, is no less base, than unfounded in his calumnies. In short, it is absolutely incommunicable why the Executive should, from a policy which it will not avow, put off a treaty, for the reforming of the existing regulations. The invasion of his燲re made was so closely allied with the expectations, of profit to the husbandman and merchant, created by our neutrality. There was no such evasion; and the agreement or understanding between Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Genet cannot be wrought into such a shape. Being without documents, containing the whole of their conversation, I have no other clue to it than the letter of August 25th, 1793, the nature of the subject, and the circumstances of the period, as explanatory of the postponement of the negotiation.

It is of no consequence to inquire, whether it was or was not more agreeable to Mr. Genet that the negotiation should lie over, when he heard that a definite answer must be delayed until the meeting of the Senate. Notwithstanding it has the appearance of being the voluntary act of both; especially as Mr. Genet suffered it to rest upon an oral discourse, and never had, nor asked, a written answer; yet let it be conceded to have been, on the part of Mr. Jefferson, an act of the Government, and on the part of Mr. Genet, a respectful submission.

But when the President pronounced an opinion in favor of the Senate's advice and consent of the Senate. A definite answer was, therefore, necessarily deferred. He did not allege that intermediate discussions could not take place; nor indeed does it appear that either of those gentlemen turned their attention to the preliminary negotiation; which might have been opened before the assembling of the Senate. It is evident the President pronounced his opinion in favor of the Senate's advice and consent of the Senate. An answer was, therefore, necessarily deferred. He did not allege that intermediate discussions could not take place; nor indeed does it appear that either of those gentlemen turned their attention to the preliminary negotiation; which might have been opened before the assembling of the Senate.

The President's opinion pronounces his intention, in the remoulde of the treaty, to be derived from evasion, or alienation from France, stood in the way. 1. "On the declaration of war between France and England, the United States being at peace with both, their situation was so new and unexperienced by themselves," that it was extremely desirable to avoid any exchange which would absorb much time, and might be postponed; in order that the Executive might be unharassed in its superintendence of our neutral character. 2. The commencement of the war in the early part of September, 1793, been seen by the world, yet cannot they judge of the perplexities and researches which were the foundation of the documents published, and which hourly occurred to the President, so that he, and the Congress, were unable, and ought not, to consult the Senate, which was most injurious to our interests. 3. The power of the President to authorize the Secretary of State, or indeed any other person, to diggest the matter of a treaty, has been recognized in practice in several forms; one of which is barely to nominate, with the advice and consent of the Senate, a person to whom he assigns the treaty. In a former case, which the treaty which was negotiated at the seat of Government, the treaty with the Creek Indians at New York, in 1790. The Senate being on the spot, and, therefore, convenient to the negotiation, were asked, as the subject was passing, whether they would ratify certain clauses, if inserted in the treaty. In the re-adjustment of the treaty of commerce with France, it was probably wished to repeat the same measure.

What would have been gained by France, by precipitating the negotiation? The preliminary discussions might, perhaps, have closed a few months sooner on the side of the President; but it is entirely uncertain whether the affair would have been expedited by any step, so much as by consulting the Senate upon points of particular importance. The President's work was made to depend upon the Senate; and the Senate's was dependent upon a negotiation in the United States, and is unsustainable in a negotiation elsewhere. However, if a commencement had been made, I question whether, from the time which is indispensable for so grand a transaction, and the unvulnerable interruption incident to the new state of things, we should not have been obliged to interview the President, by a paper, in which the French wrote that we were too much employed in steering clear of the war, to attend for the present to the remoulde of the treaty.

Had the Executive been indisposed to the treaty, why did he in a manner pledge himself to negotiate with the Senate? If he was under the necessity of having a treaty, French was it expired at the end of 1792. 2. The President's original previsions of the treaty with France, it was really supposed, by the Executive of France this delay, which has prevented, as yet, our formal accession to their proposition to treat with them, that the President will meet them, with the most friendly dispositions, on the grounds of treaty proposed by the National Convention, as soon as he can do in the forms of the constitution; and of course to suggest, for this purpose, that the powers of Mr. Jefferson, which were renewed to his successor. A formal access to the treaty, and a negotiation in the forms of the constitution, appear to be still preferred to informal discussions, for the reasons already assigned. It is impossible to look into this subject, without remarking that other principles may be equally, upon which the Executive might have refused to treat immediately but which do not apparently influence his decision. His attention must have been arrested by the diction of Mr. Genet's overtures. The President and the French republic had hitherto agitated a change in commercial regulations only; when Mr. Genet announces a desire to modify the political connexion also. The private meaning of the term political was not, though the usual or natural interpretation was, that the political relation, established by the treaty of alliance, was to be proposed to be revised. The movements which have been noticed, of Mr. Genet, before his arrival at Philadelphia from Charleston, were in perfect union with this interpretation. The very decree of the 19th of February, 1792, liberal in its language, but a concession for the French colonies could not be fed without supplies from the United States; and the suspension of the law of May 15th, 1791, which had inhibited the Americans from introducing, selling and arming vessels in France, and from enjoying all the privileges allowed to those built in the ship yards of the republic, was calculated to confound the French negotiations.

To confirm the real views of the Executive Council of France in the regeneration of the treaty, recollect these passages in Mr. Genet's instructions:

That the executive council are disposed to set on foot a negotiation upon those foundations, and that they do not know what the President of the United States will more extensive, in becoming a national agreement, in which two great powers shall suspend their commercial and political interests, and establish a mutual understanding, to defend the empire of liberty, wherever it can be embraced; to guarantee the sovereignty of the people, and punish those Powers who should enter into foreign intrigues, or establish a confederacy for the ports of contracting parties. Such a pact, which the people of France will support with all the energy which distinguishes them, and which they have already given so many proofs, will quickly contribute to the general emanation of the new world. However vast this project may be, it will not be difficult to execute, if the American people determine on it; and it is to convince them of its practicality that citizen Genet must direct all his attention for,
Besides the advantages which humanity in general will draw from the success of such a negotiation, we have at this moment a particular reason to desire that it may be happily concluded. The Powers attack us from hatred to our principles; if the English ministers, instead of sharing in the glory of France, instead of considering that our liberty, as well as that of those people whose chains we have broken, forever establishes that of their own country, suffer themselves to be influenced by our enemies, and by those to the liberties and possessions we have gained, and to the cause of the Revolution, that they may extinguish the nostrums making in Great Britain every day more and more serious, and have an intimate connexion with those of Spain. The friendship which reigns between the ministers of the last Power and those of St. James's proves it and in this situation of affairs we ought to excite, by all possible means, the zeal of Americans, who are as much interested as ourselves in the fate of the Republics on our coast. They are our natural allies, and it is our interest to make them so. Their own safety still depends on ours, and, if we fail, they will sooner or later fall under the iron rod of Great Britain. The executive council has no reason to believe, that these reasons, in addition to the great commercial advantages which we are disposed to concede to the United States, will determine their Government to adopt the measure, that all that citizen Genet shall propose to them on our part. As it is possible, however, that the false representations which have been made to Congress of the situation of our interior affairs; of the state of our maritime force; of our finances; and especially of the storms with which we are threatened; may make her ministers, in the negotiations which they are now engaged, do violence to their principles, and avail themselves of every pretext, in expectation that the American Government will finally determine to make a common cause with us, to take such steps as will appear to him exigencies may require, to serve the cause of liberty and the freedom of the people.

The project, therefore, of a treaty, on the basis of Mr. Genet's propositions, ought to have been well explored before the first advance. To assent to them, if it would not have been a departure from neutrality, would at least have magnified the suspicion of our faith, without a confidence in which that neutrality must always be insecure. To reject them was to incur discontent, possibly a breach with our ally. The councils of nations ought to be superior to the passions which drive individuals. Permanent good being the polar star of the fore, they will often have to encounter the impetuosity of the latter, who substitute occasional feelings for sound policy.

Admitting that the non-establishment of a constitution, and the rapid successions in the administrative bodies, could not weaken an agreement once fixed, even under the pressure of war, there was no probability that the party, which was the first to make the move, could have secured a treaty with the English, equally possible those who should rise upon the ruins of his friends. We knew from letters, that, as far back as Aug., 1792, the movers of the Revolution on the 10th of that month were, sooner or later, destined to be victims: the fact that was remembered was the overtures of the downfall which awaited them. That, in March, 1793, an insurrection was brewing for the destruction of the Girondine; and that the revolutionary tribunal, vast and unbounded in its domination, had been erected. Was this, then, a season for "modifying the political connexion," when we might have drawn hostility upon our heads, by betraying a spirit not impartial, and by taking measures which, amid the fluctuations in the leaders of the French politics, might not have been sanctioned? And what did actually happen? The conduct of the Robespierrian faction was directly the reverse of the Brissotine; the one encouraged, the other abolished, private trade. For the evidence of this fact, I refer you to your own knowledge; to the vexations of our commerce; to the decrees which violated our treaty; and to the decree of October, 1793, which took all trade into the hands of Government. Nor can I omit the demonstration of a general instability, as it was delivered in a late report of the five committees:

"Let us be persuaded, and let us proclaim it openly—it is to that perpetual change that all our evils are owing. Our republican annals do not yet include three years, and by the multiplicity of events, twenty centuries appear relatively calm. Your progenitors were subjected to revolutions, to abdications, to usurpations,—all have changed, every thing changes yet; and, in this continual ebb and flow of opposite movements, in vain would the Government pretend to that confidence which can only be the result of a steady and wise conduct, and of a constant attachment to principles.

"Commerce necessarily disappeared through this astonishing succession of contrarieties, and in a country where individuals, incapacitated for making any sure calculations, see around them nothing but a wide prospect of changes.

"Credit is a tender plant, which needs gentle and regular winds, and cannot grow in a tempestuous cliime, or soil so torn.

"If it be true that we should put a period to the reign of uncertainties, and fix invariably the principles of justice, equity, and loyalty, which should be the guides of our conduct. Let us hasten to subject the internal administration to a regular system. Let us especially take care that no measure ever gives rise to fears concerning the solidity of the monarchical government.

"When the Government, steady in its march, shall have shown the real end they aim at, when they have rendered an account to itself and to others, of the system it intends to adopt; when the Convention, dismissing those unfortunate bucklerings which have too often impeded their progress, shall attend solely to the happiness of the people of the time, and thus cease to reject with indulgence all measures which our inhriters, in the least degree, of the principles of justice and good faith which should direct them; then all alarms will be at an end, and the restoration of the finances, of credit, and of commerce, may be undertaken with assurance of success."

"Why the subject was not resumed with Mr. Genet is well known to every body who has heard of his excesses, and our declaration to the French republic, that we should expect his successor to be charged with similar powers. His letter of the 30th of September, 1793, written after the application for his recall was announced to him, was prevented, by the malady of Philadelphia, from being received by this Department, until the 6th of November, 1793. We were then coming upon a return of the vessel sent to France on that errand. Congress met in December, 1793. Our minister's letter, notifying his recall, came to hand January 14th, 1794; and Mr. Fauchet actually replaced him on the 21st of February, 1794. Let me observe, however, in passing from Mr. Genet to Mr. Fauchet, that his threat to withdraw the privileges in the decree of March 26th, 1793, and the decree itself, are strong symptoms of the result of the negotiation being more than one merely commercial. For the different alterations between him and Mr. Jefferson, to whom the reference is given, you will learn from Mr. Fauchet demanded the arrest of Mr. Genet, for punishment. Our co-operation was refused, upon reasons of law and magnanimity.

"Possessing, at his instance, for relief of the vessels which had taken refuge in the ports of the United States. We have advanced money faster than was due; and full as fast as prudence, in respect to our own wants, would permit.

The ship of the Camilla, a provision vessel of the French republic, was the effect of the embargo, which operated greatly on all. Our minister was recalled, as he desired. Mr. Fauchet complained of British vessels being suffered to depart during the embargo, with Frenchmen who meant to act against their country in the West Indies. Occasional relaxations were, however, made in the embargo, French ships, and in the particular case of the Camilla, the passports were supposed to be granted to American bottoms, for the humane purpose of returning to the islands some of the unhappy French fugitives from thence; and one of them, given to a vessel at his instance, exported a large quantity of powder, doubtless without his privity.

"TheROTTERDAM, which had been ordered to discharge its cargo by the American Minister, took Juteau, of Boston, as Mr. Fauchet desired. Whatever irritation may have been occasioned by the attorney of the district, was owing to no instruction from the President.

"The demand for dismantling Cooper's vessel was inevitable, as she had been fitted out in our ports; and wherever, in any case, restitution of vessels was required from us, the rules of our neutrality fully justified it.

"We restored the ship William, of Glasgow; and the damages during her detention have been assured to the agent of the captors."
FOREIGN RELATIONS. [1797.]

The steps adopted, and promised, for executing the consular convention, in the apprehension of deserters, are as much as could be done or expected.

The Government, indeed, differed from Mr. Fauchet in the construction of the treaty; not holding themselves bound to exclude British ships of war, except when they came in with prizes.

It is true, however, that the object of Mr. Genet’s successor should be charged with commercial powers, yet is it not known or believed he brought any. No writing from him announced its nor yet any conversation with me; unless, indeed, in November or December last, when Macpherson’s Blues were coming into town, and I were together looking out at them from his eastern windows. He then made some casual observations respecting Mr. Jay’s negotiation. And it appeared nothing indefinite as to our treaty of commerce. My answer was, that I should be ready to receive his overtures. It would have been indecent to ask him formally whether he had such powers; but a distant hint was given by me to him, two or three months after his arrival, upon the subject; and, from his reply, I did not infer, whether he had or had not them. I am rather disposed to conclude he had them not; because he was appointed minister during the reign of Robespierre; who, as we have seen, almost extinguished commerce; and when a decree was in force assuming into the hands of Government all trade.

If Mr. Fauchet had been ready, we should have proceeded simply and without procrastination.

These are the most material of Mr. Fauchet’s transactions with the Government; except, indeed, the abomination of the embargo; the whole of which you business you witnessed yourself, and can show to have arisen from very different motives than those of disregard to France.

The communication, says the message, which I have made to you, during your present session, from the deposition of our minister to London, contain a serious aspect of our affairs with Great Britain.

The first of these communications was to Congress on the 6th of December, 1793; in which are the following passages:

"The British Government having undertaken, by order to the commanders of their armed vessels, to restrain, generally, our commerce in corn and other provisions to their own ports, and those of their friends, the instructions now communicated were immediately forwarded to our minister at that court. In the mean time we have received from them a copy of his letter, and I may expect to learn the result of his special instructions in time to make it known to the Legislature during their present session."
mission when they confirmed the nomination. For the President details no powers, and founds his nomination upon the information possessed by themselves.

It has been, or may be, objected, 1. That the Senate did not contemplate the making of any treaty whatsoever, unless stated in the instructions. But this is not the only or the principal object of the Senate. It avowed the necessity of it, and the instructions to our own minister at Paris, induced a persuasion that the President had not vested in Mr. Jay powers as extensive as a treaty of commerce; and 4. That the treaty with Great Britain is justly offensive to France.

We have already seen several times, that, whatever advantage in the power of the Senate, when the nomination was assented to, Scarcely one of them could, in the ordinary course of proceeding, be accommodated without an agreement. So expressly struck at the inexecution of the past treaty. Upon others, no treaty had ever existed, though, overtures for that purpose had been repeated by the United States. That a treaty would spring from such mission, and be concluded on the same terms to the advantage of France.

And why should not a treaty be concluded with Great Britain? Was it because she had despoiled us? The objection would lie with equal strength against even a treaty of peace. It would forbid a treaty of peace with every Power too. France and Spain are both guilty of treaty or injustice, and the latter, except her, is much more dangerous or by positive enmity, or by the withholding of some benefit. We are in no danger of being corrupted by importing foreign vices, if treaties merely, and not our own propensities, should favor them.

2. A treaty of commerce with Great Britain has for many years been anxiously pushed by the United States. What is the present situation of Great Britain? Witness the 1796 and 1797 negotiations against her for declining it. Witness the bill which passed the House of Representatives at an early session, discriminating between nations having no commercial treaty with us, and those which had. What, then, do the Secretary of State, but a plan for forcing the British Government into a treaty of commerce? Has he not clearly unfolded this sentiment? What were the commercial propositions but emanations from the same system? The want of a commercial treaty was the single circumstance which propped up the severity of the proposed distinction of acts between us and the nations of Europe?

Exclusively of these various acts, the facilities to our commerce, both European and West Indian, which would flow from such a treaty, rendered it very desirable. Perhaps, for a treaty of commerce alone, an envoy would not have been thought of. But surely, to include in one negotiation the general interests of the continent, the saving of one negotiation at least. Some of our vexations on the water were owing to the non-existence of the customary appendages to a commercial treaty. Past stipulations might have been compensated without a treaty; but a treaty was the best assurance of the future. In a word, the Senate must have been sensible of many particulars being comprehended by the general outlines of the nominal.

When the President nominates ministers, he may, if he pleases, restrict himself to the name, the grade, and the Prince or State. He might, for example, have nominated Mr. Jay this: "I nominate John Jay, as envoy extraordinario, plenipotentiario, and minister, to the United States of America, in the Court of France." If he这样的话, the President would have been at liberty to employ him in any negotiation with that King. Their power being ample on the completion of the treaty, they are not a necessary constitutional party in the concoction of it, unless the President should find it expedient to request their immediate advice. It would be superfluous to discuss how far he might have limited himself by the terms of the nomination, as I again contend, and hope I have shown, that he did not limit himself.

3. We cannot foresee the representations which Mr. Fauchet might make to his Government with respect to Mr. Jay's mission to London, you may say, that he is positively forbidden to weaken the engagements between this country and France. It is not improbable that they will be obliged to encounter on this head, suspicions of various kinds. But you may declare the motives of that mission to be, to obtain immediate compensation for our plundered property, and restitution of the rights of our merchants. You may intimate, by way of argument, but without ascribing it to the Government, that if war should be necessary, the aforesaid the people of the United States towards it would be better secured by a manifestation that every step had been taken to avoid it; and that the British nation would be divided, when they found that we were not our own country's enemies. It is not necessary that you communicate this to your principal minister, and also with respect to France, since we are unable to give her aids of men or money. To this matter you cannot be too attentive; and you will be amply justified, in repelling with firmness, any imputation of the most distant intention to sacrifice our connexion with France to any connexion with England. When we expressed a wish to "prosper the British ministry" it could not signify that we were prepared to sacrifice our own interests to theirs; by submitting to the pleasure or caprices of France any part of his instructions with which France had no concern. A contrary conduct would have been irreconcilable, also, with the independence of the United States, and would have put them into leading strings. It would have been little short of treachery under a master. 1. A treaty of commerce was altogether eventual: it was to be kept out of sight, until the posts and depreciations should be so adjusted as to promise a continuance of tranquility. 2. It was eventual in another sense; being to be concluded or not, according to the degrees of advantage. 3. It was deemed important that Mr. Jay should communicate his commercial powers to the British ministry. 4. Every commercial privilege which Great Britain should acquire, would devolve on France on like conditions. What would France say, if we were to insist that every envoy of her commercial treaties, every possibility of new commercial arrangements, should be laid before our Government? Certainly this: that no fellowship between the two countries, authorizes an expectation that their government will throw itself upon the discretion of the other to war or not its negotiations; and that national honor is an ample guard of our treaties.

Among the numberless disgusts which nations have entertained against each other, I do not remember that a treaty of commerce was ever made by the people of some nations, except it was only between several foreigners. Let me cite only two: When Portugal, early in this century, surrendered many of her commercial advantages to Great Britain; and France, not ten years ago, contracted a disadvantageous treaty with the same Power; who intimidated but their own subjects and people? If we are told that we ought not to draw our connexion closer with Great Britain, and that France will be jealous, the answer is, that if we can multiply the markets for our great staples; if we can purchase our foreign goods cheaper, by having many manufacturing nations to resort to; or if, even, in the maintenance of neutral privileges, we can, by stipulation, not derogatory from the rights of others, alter vantulations; is a commercial privilege available by any reasonable opposition. The romantic extent to which commercial privileges can be carried, would abolish every object of every nation, and all institutions appeared false government, false religion, false morals, false policy, or any other political defect.

Your instructions justify you in affirming, that Mr. Jay "is positively forbidden to weaken the engagements between this country and the Powers of Europe. At the same time, the latitude of this sentiment is tolerably great; it is, in fact, an exception, and imputable: "That as the British ministry will doubtless be solicitous to detach us from France, and maybe probably make some overture of this kind, you will inform them, that the Government of the United States will not derogate from our treaties and engagements with France." You will make no reference to an exclusion from Mr. Jay's mission of every object, except compensation for plundered property, and restitution of the posts. For a moment, let me entreat you to call to mind the different topics for negotiation, which were actually before the Senate at the time Mr. Jay's nomination, and which were not included in either of those points. Were not Mr. Jefferson's instructions upon the refusal of Great Britain to enter into a commercial treaty, and his plan for commercial reprisals, before you?
Would it not have been extraordinary to pass by so fair an opportunity of bringing forward all our discontent? Was it not urged as an objection to the measure, that the terms of the nomination were sufficiently broad for any purpose of negotiation? But appear one of these objections, and it was said that we were not entitled to make any claim to the British Ministry, for if they had been away, it is probable that our minister in London would have been directed to pursue his efforts in the ordinary tract as to every thing else. This was the true idea, when your committee prepared: "We were desirous of compelling any imputation of the most distant intention to sacrifice our cause to any contingency admitted. It would have been a piece of gross enormity, and contrary to the principles of the British Ministry, to suppose that there was any difference between the United States and Great Britain, concerning the treaty of peace." It is referred to your discretion, whether, in case the two preceding points should be so accommodated, as to promise the continuance of tranquillity between the two countries, you would not be listened to, or be even broken to the British Ministry. If it should, let these be the general objects.

Your instructions, therefore, were commensurate with fact and propriety.

1. They were literally true, because the motives were the vexations of our commerce and the posts.

2. The answers were too wide, and the motive does not always arise from the eventual.

3. The confidential proceedings of the United States are not demandable by another nation, except where that nation is injured by them.

4. Otherwise, every modification of a direct and perspicuous challenge of our rights; every compensation, but the drawback payment, every mode of restitution which was not instantaneous and unqualified, ought to have been avoided by Mr. Jay because they were not stated in your instructions as motives to his mission. But, 6th. To scout the suspicion of a deception on the French republic, what manœuvre could have been more paltry, than one which for motives must certainly exhibit in seven day? What emotions could the French republic have shown, if Mr. Jay's instructions had been inspected by them? Would they have hazarded a hint that we must have no treaty of commerce with Great Britain? We should have quoted their own example, in having repelled by arms the meddling of other nations in their internal affairs. We should have quoted our own independence, which would tolerate the control of any foreign authority in this island. What emotions could the French republic have shown, if Mr. Jay's instructions had been inspected by them?

5. And our objections were too wide, and the answer does not always arise from the eventual.

4. You are by this time probably acquainted with the treaty of Great Britain, through the communications of Colonel Trumbull, and must have determined in your own mind its probable effect upon the French republic. Until it shall have been opened a way for a satisfactory communication, as the object, you shall receive an immediate and copious communication, and more particularly in relation to the 4th inquiry, Whether the treaty with Great Britain affords just cause of offence to France? I am rather inclined to waive this inquiry, for the present, in consequence of information that the French minister is concernting an attack on the ratification of the treaty and that sentiments, no less eccentric than fatal to our independance, are to be scattered, at random, from a confidence in the popularity of the French cause. Be the issue of this business what it may, our Government will neither renounce its professions and friendly conduct to the French republic, nor assent to any impropriety which their agent may display. But you ought to know that the terms of their treaty have already (if newspapers may be credited) revived the old machinations and malicious stories of Genet. The fuel which his successor may add, from considerations and sources which I may, perhaps, hereafter explain, will receive a direction hest directest calculation to excite a flame. A flame which has spread itself over the whole expanse of an island, and is accompanied by a letter, is our refutation. We acknowledge nothing to be undone on our part which friendship would dictate, our faculties could accomplish, and our neutrality would permit. If injuries are complained of, let us reason together like cordial allies and compensate where either may have been in fault. But let it be the last blot in the annals of the United States and France cease to be what they ought to be, friends, who will endure no separation.

I now quit this lengthy subject; and shall, in other despatches, more precisely reply to the different letters which I have lately received from you.

I am, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Pars, June 4th. 1795.
of the preponderating party, so the movement appeared to be directed unequivocally to that object. The sentiments of the Convention were forced upon the French mind, in a instant, the party, preceded by a legion of women, entered and spread itself throughout the hall of that assembly. The situation was broken, and young France was at its most confusion. In a contest which took place between Ferrand, one of the deputies, a gallant and estimable member of the party, for the protection of the chair and person of the President, which were threatened with violation, the form of a pistol was found towards his body, was borne on a pike by the perpetrators of this atrocious crime, in triumph, into the bosom of the Convention. It seemed, for some time, as if that body, or at least the leading members in the preponderating party, were doomed to adopt a system of force to be secunded by a system of guise and flight. During this conflict, however, the whole assembly behaved with the utmost magnanimity; no sympathy was lost. Four were brought in, without any ceremony, to dishonor the great theatre on which they stood; and Boissy d'Anglas, who happened to preside, not only kept his seat, but, in the exhibition of his deportment a calmness and composure which became the dignified and important station which he filled. Then, after twelve o'clock, when it was terminated by the decisive effort of a body gathered from the neighboring sections, planned by the united committee of the executive, and with several of the most distinguished, Kervelegan, Anguissola, Castan, and others, the hour was in hand, nor did they cease the crisis. It had rescued the Convention was re-established, and proceeded, as upon the former occasion, to a review of what had passed in the course of the day.

The insurmountable in possession of the reins of Government, and after Boissy d'Anglas had retired, they placed the President Vernier in the chair, by force, and began an organization upon the principles that were first avowed.

They rebelled, in a mass, all the heads that were passed since the 9th Thermidor: recalled Barrere, Billault de Varennes, and Collot d'Herbois; took possession of the taciturn and the talkative; ordered the barriers of the city to be closed, and were upon the point of arresting all the members of the committee of the executive board, having appointed a commission of four deputies to take their places, and with full power to act in their stead, that, in the hour, the party for was not necessary, and with accumulated force. At this moment, however, the plan of the committee, who had continued their sitting, was ripe for execution, and fortunately the stroke was given before the system was completed.

But this was not ended by the expulsion of the insurgents from the hall of the Convention itself. They retreated back to the barricades of the city, and there, for a while, they opposed its authority. In the course, however, of the succeeding day, a considerable force was established there, under the direction of an honest and devoted member of the Convention. From those sections who voluntarily offered their service, amounting, perhaps, to fifteen thousand; and having the command of the committee of public safety; so that order may be considered as completely established, the authority of the Convention being triumphant and secure.

As soon as the Convention resumed its deliberations, the effect of those who had offended in the communion of the sea was the first object which engaged its attention. Whilst the insurgents were in possession of the hall, the members of the festival committee of the former Convention, who were already there, from Marseilles, and the neighboring country, a report to that effect being yesterday presented to the Convention of its dissolution; so that order may be considered as completely established, the authority of the Convention being triumphant and secure.

It is to be observed, that the character of this movement was decisively anti-monarchical. Its success, if the revolutionary party ever have revived the reign of terror, and most probably carried all the aristocrats, with the leading members of the preponderating party, it was called "the May and the Constitution of 1793," were written upon the hats of many of the insurgents; and whilst the hall and its victims were surrounded by the representatives of the maintenance Barrere, &c. the fedle voice of one aristocrat only was heard in favor of the constitution of 1789. Indeed the question in the hall, in the hope that, if a commotion took place, the 18th of June, when the Convention was dissolved, the standard of royalty would be erected, and the monarch re-established; and who were, in the interval, from the hour of the serious, little about the course of a week, and who are to be tried according to an arbitrary, in common with others who had suffered, it is observed, in the unrelenting of this thing, to remain in the same state of inactivity, greatly agitated, but taking no part. As soon, however, as the object of this latter movement was understood, and it became obvious that, in case it succeeded, terrorism, and not royalty, would be re-established, the disposition of this party towards the Convention, which appeared in its support. But, in truth, the force of this party in this city, and especially upon the late emergencies, did not appear great. The most gallant of its members are either upon the frontiers, at war against the republic, or have fallen already in number and vitality. These, too, consist of those who were of sufficient age to take their part in the commence-ment; for the young men of Paris, who are descended from it, or from others of the more wealthy inhabitants of the city, and who have attained their maturity during the Revolution, and whose evidences of spirit which it was natural to expect such splendid examples of patriotism would create, on which the most general, on the side of the Revolution.

That there should be a party of any force in the republic, or rather of sufficient force to disturb the Government in the manner you have seen, disposed to subvert the present system, and establish a new, without your surprise. You will naturally be inclined to ask, of what character of citizens is it composed? what their numbers and ultimate views? since it is said that a system of terror, as a permanent system of Government, can never excite your surprise. FOREIGN RELATIONS.

In every view, therefore, they must be deemed enemies to royalty, and as such, it is natural to expect they will feel a great sensibility upon all those questions which, in their judgment, have a tendency to promote it. Whether any such have been agitated or contemplated is, perhaps, doubtful: I have thought otherwise, and still think so. But it cannot be denied that many circumstances have presented themselves, in the course of the collision of parties, that were sufficient to create a strong prejudice against the court; and a portion of the latter were such as to indicate that the leading members of the preponderating party were prepared to abandon the republican scale, and incline towards monarchy, is certain. The inhabitants of these faubourgs having sided always with the Mountain party, had, on many occasions, been disaffected; and the conduct of the leaders, therefore, or rather their leaders, have been, in their turn, persecuted by the royalists. But they have likewise threatened that the party should be persevered by the present preponderating party, with whom they were engaged in uninterrupted warfare, before and since the time of Robespierre. In this respect, therefore, they saw the present preponderating party and the royalists to be united in the same design; and consequently, it was inevitable, if this was alike seen, under the administration of this party, the royalists enlarged from prison, and other measures of that kind adopted, which have probably fortified them in this belief. A report, too, which has been circulated through the city, that under the name of organic laws, it is contemplated by the committee of eleven, to introduce some important changes in the constitution, was, no doubt, a subject of sufficient interest. In an attempt to explain the cause of these movements, the above circumstances have appeared to me to merit attention, and, with that view, I have presented them.

In the last harangue I have laid before the present preponderating party and the royalists, even with respect to the terrorists, is a fact of which I have no doubt. The reign of terror continued until it could last no longer. It was necessary to suppress it, and it was suppressed. That the royalists wished this event, and gave it all the aid they could, is certain; but that their efforts were of any service in that respect is doubtful. Indeed, I was persuaded that for some time they produced an opposite effect, and for reasons that are obvious: for, as the preponderating party sought the establishment of the republic, and knew that the mountain party had the same object in view, it was reasonable to expect that, after the former had gained the ascendency, it would be disposed to treat with the latter with respect to foreign policy and monarchy; and equally so to presume that the same spirit of magnanimity which inculcated this disposition towards the republicans, and clothed them with its confidence for its political policies, would dispose to it with disdain the aid of the royalists, who were enemies to both. The sentiment is to be traced through all the measures of the Convention, from the 9th Thermidor to the 1st Prairial; for it, indeed, was the internal revolutions of the party that betrayed the convention, whilst they repudiated their principles; and terminating in other respects the reign of terror, whilst they avoided, as far as possible, the punishment of those who had been the principal authors and agents under that reign. Indeed, this party has appeared to me, and so I have often represented it to you, as equally the enemy of the opposite extreme. It has had the same object in view as that which the royalists had, and who I have concluded, from those data the Revolution itself has furnished, as well as from my own observations since my arrival, (the latter of which, it is true, has been confounded to a small circle) are destitute of a free republican spirit, which should be to guard them against the pernicious consequences that always attend a degeneracy into either of these extremes.

You will likewise ask, what effect have these movements had upon the public mind, in regard to the present system? Is it not probable they have already wearied the people out, and in consequence inclined them to royalty, purely from a desire of repose? That they are all wearied is most certain; and what may be the course of events in the progress of time, I do not pretend to determine: these lie beyond my reach, and indeed beyond the reach of all men. I only undertake to deduce immediate consequences from the facts which I witness; and when I see that these facts are supported by the operation of the principles in the mind of the people, I consider their present, to renounce their creed, and cling to the Convention for security, I cannot presume that the moderates, who are republican, will quit the safe ground on which they rest, their own ground, too, and become royalists. Royalty, therefore, I consider at present as altogether out of the question. But that these convulsive shocks, and which are of the nature of an extreme, may produce some effect, is probable. In my opinion, they will produce a good one: for I am persuaded they will occasion, and upon the report of the committee of eleven, some very important changes in the constitution of 1793; such as a division of the legislature into two branches, with an organization of the executive and judiciary upon more independent principles than that constitution admits of; upon those principles, indeed, which exist in the American constitution, and are well understood there. Should this be the case, the republican system will have a fair experiment here; and that it may be the case, must be the wish of all those who are the friends of humanity everywhere.

The words of Mr. Pinckney are at this moment engaged, Mr. Pinckney arrived here the other day to Madrid, and was a spectator of the great scene it exhibited to the close: a few days after which he pursued his route, by the way of Bordeaux, where, before this, he is probably arrived. Whilst here, I presented to his view what had passed between this Government and myself upon the subject of his mission: assuring him, from what I had heard and seen, that I was of opinion, and could explain upon the grounds of the convention, that they had laid no claim upon what aid they conveniently could in support of his negotiation; satisfying them, at the same time, that they were not injured by Mr. Jay's treaty, they would do it. I likewise showed him a letter I had just received from Mr. Short, written at the instance of the Duke de la Acula, to request that I would promulgate, by certain communications to this Government, a negotiation between Spain and this republic, he having previously and positively informed Mr. Short that our demands should be yielded and adjusted at the same time. Mr. Pinckney was sensible of the benefit which the aid of this republic could yield in his negotiation, and wished it; but upon mature consideration, was of opinion he could not request such aid without a conditioning precedent, and new Mr. Jay's treaty, and which the states did not choose to do, for considerations delicacy forbade me to inquire into. It was, however, equally his and my wish that his journey through the country should be marked with all those circumstances of reciprocal civility between the Government and himself, which are always due, and generally paid, when the representative of a foreign nation visits the committee, and obtained for him an amicable interview with the members of its diplomatic state, and by whom he was received with the most respectful attention.

But I may as well be at this time already seen that England and Spain are each, and without the knowledge of the other, seeking a separate peace with this republic. What the motive for such secrecy on the part of the former is, remains to be hereafter unfolded: but what it is on the part of the latter is easily understood: for as she apprehends, in case a peace is made with France, a declaration of war from England, and of course, in case the attempt to obtain peace is known, some new pressure from that Power, it follows that she must wish the arrangement to be complete, to guard her against the ill consequences which might otherwise attend such an event before any thing upon up that head transpires. As soon, however, as it is known to Spain that England seeks a separate peace, her jealousy of the views of England will be excited, and she will become active for an engagement, or at least, at all events, by which she can be preserved, cannot be considered as remote. Whether our claims upon Spain will be attended to, under existing circumstances, in that adjustment, is a point upon which it is impossible for me to determine: for, as a member of the committee, I have been, and am still, without communication with the committee, I have lately forborne all further communication with the committee upon that subject. Mr. Pinckney will be able, soon after his arrival at Madrid, to ascertain the temper of the Spanish court in regard to our demands, and the means by which his present peaceable views will be best effectually prosecuted; and it may be that the views of which I have spoken will be known, and which the laws of Spain may not allow the dictation of the line in which, if in any, I may be serviceable; and in the interim, I shall not only be prepared to co-operate with me may suggest, but to obey with promptitude any instructions you may be pleased to give me in this or any other respect. achieved in this post, one of the strongest in Europe, has opened the campaign on the part of France with great brilliancy. As it was taken, too, after a long siege, and when all possible efforts to raise it had proved abortive, it not only demonstrates the superiority of the French arms in the present stage of the war, but furnishes satisfactory ground whereon to calculate, according to the former course of events, this ultimate termination of resistance. Young perhaps had reason to form, as it was contemplated, made his life, with the Government, an object of interest, since it would have forwarded, in some respects, its views in the depending negotiation.

I have just been honored with yours of April 7th, and shall pay due attention to its contents.

P. S. I am sorry to inform you of the death of Mr. Coffyn, consul for the port of Dunkirk. His loss is to be regretted, as he was able, diligent, and faithful, in the discharge of the duties of his office. His son is very desirous of succeeding him, and certainly, if any one not an American, is appointed, it will be impossible to find for it a more proper candidate. This is only to point out some merits of the father, who was distinguished for his services and attachment to our country, entitle his memory to some attention, and doubt not your letter of acknowledgment, addressed to his son, on that head, through me, will be gratefully received.

Mr. Morse to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, June 9th, 1793.

Sir:

Since my last, is reduced to a certainty that the British Government has revived its order of the 6th November, 1793, and commenced, on this side the Atlantic, the same system of warfare and pilage upon our commerce that was practised on it by that Government at that very calamitous era. Between thirty and forty sail, does not the British Government, have been already taken from their destination and carried into those of that island; and, as the period has arrived, when the invitation which the distresses of this country gave to our merchants here and at home, to embark their fortunes in this supply, is likely to produce its effect, it is more than probable that other vessels, and to a great amount, will share the fate. Among those of our vessels that are at sea, who they seem to be, and what part of the enemy, at present, is less than the ruin of their trade, and under which impression many are about to abandon it for the present, and send their vessels home in ballast. What effect this measure will produce upon this Government, under existing circumstances, I cannot pretend to determine. Formerly it adopted the same measure, for the purpose of countering its enemy; but the impolicy of that procedure was, afterwards, discussed and demonstrated, and the measure itself, in consequence, abandoned. At present, the distress of the country is great, and the Government will, no doubt, be mortified to find, that, of the vessels which have been lost, or goods destroyed, some part of the whole of British vessels and its destruction of British vessels, the port of this republic, and, like British ports, destined equally for these, and the ports of other countries. The measure has obviously excited a kind of ferment in their councils, but, I presume, will be directed against their enemies only. Be as it may, I do not give it in this direction, and will oppose those arguments which were used upon the former occasion. But, should they fail in producing the desired effect, and a less amicable policy be adopted, which, however, I think will not be the case, I shall deem it my duty immediately to advise you of it, by a vessel (in case such other offers) to be despatched for the purpose.

It will obviously attract your attention, that this measure was so timed by the British cabinet, that it might have no influence in the decision of the Senate upon the treaty of Mr. Jay; nor can the motive for such an accommodation be less doubtful; for, in case it be rejected, they will deem the stroke a lucky one, since thereby, they will either had a fortunate gain, and, if it is adopted, they will probably presume that so much time will be consumed in convening the Congress, should that measure be decreed expedient, that the course of events here may render it impossible for our efforts to produce a favorable effect, and which consideration, they will likewise make against us. This kind of calculation, however, is not only the proligacy, but the desperation of the Government, and will, probably, precipitate the crisis which, notwithstanding all its follies and enormities, might yet have been postponed for some time to come. I think the measure will give new vigor to the French councils, and will, probably, bring immediately upon its authors, Denmark and Sweden. Upon such an event, therefore; for, as I conceive it to be connected with the interests of those Emperor, and will, probably, be speedily made known. I have carefully avoided several conferences, that were sought of me by Baron Stael, from Sweden, soon after his arrival, because I knew nothing could result from them, and was fearful, as I presumed the result would be known to the committee, it might produce an ill effect there.

Your measures will, no doubt, be greatly influenced by the probability of the early termination or continuation of the war with this republic, and upon which some information will, of course, be expected from me. You will, however, perceive the disadvantage under which I must give any opinion upon that point, and estimate it accordingly:

for, as I am authorized to say nothing to this Government of what you will probably do, in case the war continues, (for the revulsion of the order of the 6th November could not be foreseen) you will of course conclude it impossible for me to sound it upon that topic. Indeed I was fearful that, by my communications upon a former occasion, slight effects could be produced, I was, therefore, as much concerned as you, heard of Mr. Jay's treaty, and until I had a conference with the committee on the subject. My judgment must, therefore, be formed upon general and external circumstances, and by which I perceive no prospect of an early accommodation of the war between France and England. On the contrary, the preparations on both sides seem to go on with more vigour, and the signs of activity for its continuance. The fleet of England is said to be raised to a height, beyond what it ever attained before, and efforts are still making to keep it there, if not to increase it; and France is exerting her almost endeavors to increase hers, and which are the more necessary, in consequence of the improved excursions of the last winter, by which it was greatly injured in the Atlantic as well as the Mediterranean seas. 'To expect, by a continuance of those endeavors, the Breast fleet will be ready to take the sea by the fall. The Mediterraneans one is said now to be at sea, and in good order. It is likewise expected that the Dutch fleet, at least to the amount stipulated, will be in readiness in time to co-operate with that from Breest; for great efforts were latterly made there in the cause of the French (Add to all this the very formidable authority that it is one) that the overtures made by Sir Frederic Eden were repulsed, and in a manner which immediately closed, under the powers possessed by the parties respectively, all further conference on the subject. In these circumstances, I am led to conclude that the war will continue from these Powers will be continued for some time to come, and, most probably, until some change, by battle, or otherwise, is wrought in the fortunes of one or both, so as to dispose them for peace.

If Denmark and Sweden, and especially if they are joined by Spain, on the side of France and Holland, they will, probably, be disposed to continue the war. In all events, this is the point in which which she is unexposed, it continued for any time, must not only exhaust her resources, but excite great discontent among the people. They have been alloyed, latterly, by the assurances of the minister that the people of France would be starved, and that the Government must, in consequence, accommodate, and which were countenanced by the movements which took place here some time after these assurances were given. But, when it is seen denied, and seen denied, and seen denied, and seen denied, and seen unexampled patience, are quiet, and in the possession of the fruits of a plentiful harvest, as proved by their calm case, it is doubtful whether a change will not soon take place in the temper of those on the other side of the channel.

What part it becomes our country to take at this crisis, belongs not to me to say. Peace is a blessing which ought not to be wantonly thrown away. But, whether sufficient sacrifices have not been already made to preserve it, and the time arrived when the duty we owe to ourselves, and the respect which is due to the opinions of the world, admonish us that the insults and injuries of Britain are to be no longer borne, and that we ought to seek redress by a direct appeal to arms, or by an appeal to a cause upon the event of war, is a point, which will, no doubt, be wisely decided by those who have a right to decide it. Permit me, however, to add, that in case any active measure is taken, or likely to be taken, in consequence of these aggressions, that you will immediately apprise me of it, that I may, without delay, begin to make a correspondent impression upon the councils of the Government.

I omitted in my last to transmit to you a copy of the letter from Mr. Short, which I mentioned was shown to Mr. Pinckney; and which, as it demonstrates how completely we may command success in our demands upon Spain, provided France aids us in that respect, ought not to be withheld, and especially in the present state of our affairs, and the communication which I have received; and I think it not unworthy of importance for you to possess, it will reflect honor on Mr. Short, upon account of the able and comprehensive view he has taken of the subject.

I beg to inform you that the committee of eleven have at length reported a plan of government, of which I herewith enclose you a copy. The discussion upon the merits will commence in a few days, and as soon as the question is finally decided, I will transmit to you the result.

Mr. Short to Mr. Monroe.

ARANUZ, May 4, 1795.

DEAR SIR,

I have waited for your answer to my late letters, and particularly that of the 11th of April, before writing to you again, if it had not been for the particular circumstance which makes the subject of this. I have already mentioned to you the desire of this Government to open the way to a pacification with the French commonwealth, and the dispositions on the part of the French to enter into negotiation, although perhaps an unofficial one, was on foot. I am contented in that opinion, and you may consider as well, whether you have not an opportunity of sending me a letter, which you have not yet sent me, which you may have in your hands, which you may write to Mr. Pinckney, to whom you sent me a letter enclosed in yours of the 6th of February last, and the person by whom those letters were written. I have good reason to believe that this business has met with some kind of delay as to the articles that you have written, at least that the persons who are expected to come should be able to come to a decision. You will readily conceive, from the situation of this country in respect to England, that they would be afraid to enter openly on negotiation, without being previously sure of its success, lest they should find themselves between two fires. The apprehension of England has certainly restrained them lately, and not any aversion to peace with the French commonwealth, which, on the contrary, they desire most sincerely and arduously.

Under these circumstances, the friendly interference of the United States has been wished for by this Government. I have already explained to you the difficulties which presented themselves to me, from the points in litigation between this country and the French, and the circumstances of Mr. Pinckney's appointment for that purpose rendering it necessary that they should be delayed for his arrival, and that they arrived here.

I have the fullest assurances from this Government, that all matters shall be settled to the satisfaction of the United States and although present circumstances ensure whatever the United States may now desire here, yet, under my circumstances, I should have chosen not taking an active interference until I should have conferred with Mr. Pinckney, and he with this Government. For a long time I had no doubt Mr. Pinckney would have been here ere this. I suppose he must be, at present, somewhere in France, on his way hither; but I have received no letter from him since that of the 6th of March. Things would have probably gone on in this way until his arrival, viz., this Government contenting themselves with the correspondents on foot between the two persons mentioned above, and perhaps also between the Generals of the two armies, if nothing had occurred to make them more anxious to accelerate the business; but this has taken place in consequence of the treaty concluded between the French commonwealth and the Kingdom of Prussia.

The Duke de la Alcudia has now mentioned to me his desire that no further time should be lost, and that an active negotiation should be immediately opened; declaring to me confidentially, and authorizing me to mention to you, his real and sincere wish to conclude immediately a treaty with the French commonwealth; desiring, however, that it should be done in such a manner that there should be no suspicion of the state of the vessels until the conclusion and ratification of the treaty. He has, therefore, requested me to communicate this to the minister of the United States at Paris, and to add his desire to receive here, for the purpose of concluding the treaty, the person who shall be chosen and remain here, in a secret way, until the business should be concluded and ratified. The desire of France, as you know, that this treaty should be kept secret from the apprehension of England. This he wishes you to propose to the French Government, if you find it will be acceptable to them. This is the nature of his request to me, and which I have not thought it proper, for several reasons, to decline. Several of these reasons will naturally occur to yourselves.

Having thus stated the request of the Duke in the simplest form, it is for you to decide thereon what you may think advisable to do and in which you will, of course, be guided by what you conceive to be for the interest of the United States, and conformable to the wishes of the Government where you reside, whose interests are co-extensive with those of the United States.

It may not be improper to subjoin here some incidental remarks which took place between the minister here and myself, on the above occasion. In stating to me his wish that this business should be concluded as soon as possible, he said that he had a personal interest in the conclusion of a treaty between the two countries, and could not withdraw his wish this treaty to be grounded; but that he had no such personal interest, and that it would be impossible for him to send one, without its being found out here or at Paris, by England. On my mentioning the probability of the same discovery being made, if the French Government should send a person here, he said there would be much less difficulty, if that person was charged not to discover himself, or to pass for an American; and that the communications between himself and the minister here might pass through my hands, so as to remove all suspicion of his being a person charged with a negotiation.

It is proper to communicate this desire of the Duke de la Alcudia to the French Governments, you will observe that nothing in writing has passed between us, and that his request to me is made only verbally. Although I have not the smallest doubt myself, of the full and unequivocal sincerity with which he has thus expressed himself to me, yet I would not choose to induce the French Government to adopt the measure proposed, without, at the same time, assuring them that the grounds of my assurance are not only such as to render it more than probable, but sufficient to render it certain, and that it would be impossibly for me to enter into negotiation for peace, and should choose to have some written ground, I suppose it probable that the minister would not refuse to communicate to me in confidence, in writing, his desire above mentioned; if he should, I believe, the more readily comply with. The Duke has not denied it is possible to conclude the business in this manner, and, indeed, the ground of all the communication which has taken place between the two countries is, the proposed negotiation between France and the United States, and the apprehension that it may be found out by England.

the peace to be settled with the republic; but I did not choose to press on this head, because it did not seem to be the proper time to ask for particular things, and also because, as he knows my attachment to France, in common with that of every other friend, he would not be willing that my request should be absolutely necessary. From our conversation, however, as well on this, as on preceding occasions, I find his desire would be to avoid, if possible, contracting any article which might force this country into an immediate war with England. He is determined to risk that event, however, if the simple deviation from the convention of May 25, 1793, and the terms, should not, he will not like to lose the other. He says, however, that Spain's making a separate peace would not induce England to declare war against her under present circumstances. He would desire, therefore, to conclude a peace as simple as possible. He would choose to avoid guarantying to France the island of Corsica, and such parts of the East Indies as he can; he is quite satisfied with the present state of the country, and does not wish the incurring of an immediate war with England. But the desire of this country is that France should reconquer those places, as it is the real interest of Spain that they should belong to France rather than to England. I mention these things merely as the first desire of the minister; how far he might be induced to any other deviation from the terms which the French republic will accept in the course of the negotiation, if it should be opened. The greatest difficulty will be as to the parts of Spain conquered by France; and I apprehend, as I have mentioned above, that some difficulty has already shown itself as probable, as to the place of Figueras. It is the business of negotiation, of course, to remove difficulties and make these more simple before sending an agent here, and I will inform you how far they wish previously to be made acquainted with the outlines of the sentiments of this court, it is probable the minister would communicate them. At the same time, he would probably expect an equal mark of confidence, through you at a distance, of resolutions, on the same head, of the French Government.

This letter will be forwarded by the minister, through the frontiers, by a flag; you will therefore soon receive it. I will thank you immediately to acknowledge the receipt thereof, and to let me know, as soon as possible, whether you have judged it proper to take any step in consequence thereof, and what shall have been the result thereof. Send your letters on this subject, by the same way by which you sent that of the 8th of February, the last I have received from you. I have as yet no answer from the President, as to the absence from hence which I have asked. I hope, ere long, to have the pleasure of renewing to you, in person, the assurances of my being sincerely your friend and servant.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Short.

PARIS, May 30, 1795.

I was favored, about ten days past, with yours of the 14th instant, and should have answered it immediately, had I not previously done so by anticipation, in some measure, in one of the same date through the armies, or had I not waited for the arrival of Mr. Pinckney, who was then on his way from Dunkirk for this place. By him this will be forwarded, also the two letters; and he will at the same time communicate the circumstances of the negotiation. I therefore, permit me to assure you, that this Government will admit of no intermediate or third parties in its negotiations, but will only treat with its enemies themselves, or directly. The only Power whose good offices they ever thought of accepting was the United States; but the negotiation of Mr. Jay with England has, by its manner, and particular recommendations, produced such a result, inspired with such friendship by the sentiments of all who are disposed not even to accept of ours. This is a fact of importance which I did not choose to hazard through the route of the Spanish Government, it might lessen our weight in our negotiation with that court; for I always knew that an opinion of a good understanding between us and this Government would greatly strengthen our position. You understand; and yet, I shall be happy, as far as I can, to do you any service in that particular.

I have heard that Mr. Jay has stipulated something in his treaty respecting the Mississippi; whereby, upon the inevitable necessity of a guarantee to us, an extension of territory is substantially given to Britain, and she, in consequence, admitted to the Mississippi. The fact of a guarantee by Britain to us is the most extraordinary thing I ever heard of in my life, and yet it affects the treaty of France towards her, though ready to yield the point to us; but the extension of her territory so as to comprehend the source of that river, and thereby entitle her to its navigation, will produce a more serious and alarming effect. I think it will tend greatly to separate Spain from England, and to force the former into a more intimate connexion with France and the United States, the first step towards which is an accommodation to their present demands.

Another circumstance which will facilitate this object is, that England, through Sir F. Eden, has absolutely and very lately, attempted, upon the pretext of an exchange of prisoners, to open a negotiation for peace with this republic. I do not say that Spain knows nothing of this, but I am assured, by authority in which I confide, that it is the truth. He was of opinions which would not necessitate the same terms were sent to the committee, and an answer received, peremptorily rejecting them. If true, I presume the fact will be made known to Spain, so that the latter Power ought to reject all delicacy towards the former in its transactions with it.

The minister tells me that the Spanish negotiate for the necessity of demand, if possible, in our negotiation with Spain. Suppose he peace made with this republic; she is, of course, relieved from the pressure which disposes her to accommodate us. Shall we not afterwards stand of course nearly on the same ground that we stood in that negotiation, from the epoch of the one which was conducted by Mr. Jay with Mr. Gardoqui, which had well nigh ended (though not absolutely an agreement to render it ineffectual). He latter having inside, the river, and dismemberment of the continent; which negotiation has certainly deluded the Spanish Government, from that time to the present day, into an opinion that half America wish it shan't; at least, to me (who was in the Congress during the pendency of that negotiation, and who have since seen your correspondence) such appeared to be the case.

The above are hints upon the real state of things here, upon which Mr. Pinckney and yourself will take your measures. If I could satisfy this Government that Mr. Jay's treaty contained nothing of which they have a right to complain, every thing would be easy here we might forward the views of the two continents; but their hands inside, which, in respect to this, I ardently wish to forward, making previously those of our own secure. But can any motive of interest, on the part of France, induce her to accept such offers from us, until she shall receive such satisfaction as shall induce her to make any return? I think not, and therefore, should be always happy to hear from you in these respects.

I enclose you a letter from a friend of yours in this country, being assured it contains nothing of a treasonable nature, no intelligence of the march of armies, or preparations against Spain, which it is the interest of this Government to keep secret.
Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, July 6, 1819.

Sir:—About three or four weeks past, one of our vessels, which touched at Havre from England, was taken in charge by the Government, and the captain and passengers confined, upon a suspicion they had brought false passports with them, with a view of circumventing the commercial regulations, through the vigor of its existing laws. Complete search was made upon the vessel, but no passports were found. As I knew that the suspicion which was entertained ought not to be extended to three young men who were passengers, I immediately applied to the Government for their release, and have since, by the intervention of our minister, of whom I am sure you are aware, been informed by the municipal government at Havre that they have been released.

I may add that this violent and unfriendly proceeding, though it is not without precedent, has yet given me matter for serious reflection. It would have been better for the French government, instead of being actuated by a desire to diminish the importations of American vessels, to have shown a more liberal spirit in regard to the fair, and, as I am declared to be, the honest purposes of foreign commerce. However, I have to acknowledge the activity and liberality of the minister of foreign relations, Mr. Talleyrand, who has been the chief instrument in this transaction; and I am happy to say, that the principal patriotic interest of France will be interested, in not allowing this appearance of the spirit of injustice to remain. as an act of barbarity, excelled only by those which were formerly perpetrated in the same neighborhood by the in "capricious Carrières.

It is believed that a treaty has taken place between England and Russia, in which the former has stipulated not to take the side of Poland against the latter; in consideration whereof, Russia is to furnish England a certain number of ships during the residue of the war. It is likewise believed that England has announced to Spain that, in case the latter makes peace with France, she will commence immediate hostilities upon her. This may possibly keep Spain in a state of suspense some time longer. On the other hand, it is obvious that the connexion between France and Russia is strengthened, whilst Austria, paralyzed by the peace and movements of Prussia, which threaten an entire change in the Germanic system, and such an arrangement of its parts as will give an entire preponderance to Prussia, scarcely knows what part to take; whether to make peace or continue the war. It is the interest of Prussia that Austria should continue the war; for the pressure of France upon that monarchy is the only barrier to the views of Prussia, by throwing the members of the Empire into her arms, with a view of securing their peace with France, through the intercession of Prussia.

In conversation a few days past with Baron Stael, ambassador from Sweden, he informed me of a communication forwarded by the court of Sweden to Mr. Pinckney at London, for our Government, and upon which no answer was given, although it was much wished.

I desired his communication in writing, that I might forward it to you, and which was accordingly given, and is hereewith transmitted. I have no doubt that whatever he says to me is known to the committee, as I was informed by some of the members in the beginning of the winter, and before the Baron arrived, that such an application had been made to us from that quarter. It belongs to me only to forward this paper, and which I do, not doubting that I shall be instructed relative thereto, in the most suitable manner.

Colonel Humphreys has just arrived, and, upon due consideration, I presented last night a paper to the committee, opening, as far as was expedient, the extent of his visit and upon which subject generally I shall be more full in my next, when I hope to be possessed of an answer.

The Secretary of State of the United States to Mr. Monroe.

Philadelphia, July 31, 1795.

Sir: By a past opportunity, I did myself the honor of sending to you a printed copy of the proposed treaty between the United States and Great Britain; with it was bound up a copy of the act of our Senate. The want of precedent for such a mode of ratification; the doubts, whether they meant to sit in judgment again upon the article to be added; whether the President can ratify without re-submitting the new article to them; whether he can ratify before himself inspects the new article, after it shall have been assented to by the British King; and what effect the suspension of the 14th article will have upon all those subsequent to the 10th, create difficulties and delays, even independent of the "real merits" of the treaty. The newspapers which have been forwarded to you, will show the unpopularity of the treaty at Boston and New York. I am, etc. &c.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, August 1st, 1795.

Sir: I was sorry to find, some days after my last, that the disquietude which I intimated existed in the councils of this republic, and which was occasioned by the disputes between its ports and commerce and those of England and had given birth, assumed a form still more unpleasant in regard to us, than I then apprehended it would do: for, whilst the subject was under discussion between the commissary and myself, and, as I thought, approaching towards a close, the committee interposed, and taking the business out of his hands, addressed me on the same subject, and to the same effect, laying at the same time the draught of a decree before the Convention, the principal object of which was to proclaim all those, who were not born within the jurisdiction of the neutral Powers, from the protection of the ministers of those Powers here. The decree, you will observe, was made general, as well as the letter which preceded it from the committee. I had, however, seen too much of the business not to know that, in regard to others, it was formal only, whilst it was, in reality, pointed against a particular description of our own citizens, and of Englishmen, who, by means of American passports obtained elsewhere, and, no doubt, by fraud, sometimes passed for such.
As I presumed it was not the intention of the committee or Convention, that the decree should be construed and executed strictly, because my knowledge of foreign principles could not be supposed, and because I likewise knew that many of those who it would thereby comprehend, were resident and valuable members of our community, and had been, and now were, by their commerce, useful to France. I demanded immediately an explanation from the committee, of the decree, and soon afterwards obtained an interview with that body; in which I was explicitly assured that it did not mean that call in question any principle insisted on by us; that their only wish was to exclude Englishmen; and that, in regard to myself, they meant to impose on me no restraint, in granting passports, I had not already observed. Thus, this business has happily terminated precisely where it ought to do, without producing any real change here, or rather effect any where which can be hurtful to France, or the cause you have for aid of this Government will be given in support of our negotiation with Algiers, &c. Upon this you may, I think, count with certainty, as I have been assured of it by the committee, and am furnished with all the light which their past negotiations with that regency enable them to give us on that subject. Difficulties of a different sort, and peril, are alluded to, and already foreseen.

The firmness insisted for this business, I understand, in England, and the English intercourse law prohibits, as I hear, and under the penalty of death, the payment of draughts from this country, in favor of any person in France, or who has been in France since the commencement of the war between the two nations. Perhaps this law may not be declared null, for we can conceive, perhaps, the immediate necessity of so doing; or the wish to prevent the failure of the treaty on that account. Colonel Humphreys is still here upon this business; and, as we devote our unremitted attention to it, you may be assured that no measure necessary to its success will be omitted that we are capable of.

As I am informed, the emigrant army, which lately landed in the bay of Quiberon, under the auspices of Great Britain, has been completely defeated, and its whole force, amounting to about ten thousand men, either slain or taken prisoners; of which about four thousand were slain. Many of those who composed that army, are said to have been raised by force, and were of course immediately set at liberty.

By the law, all the others are doomed to suffer capital punishments; but it is to be hoped, as many of them are weak and misguided men, its rigour will be moderated, at least in regard to them.

Within a few days past, also, a peace was concluded with Spain whereby the whole of the island of St. Domingo is ceded to France, the latter making her conquests made in that island since the war. That there are some secret articles is more probable. I herewith send you a copy of the treaty, as likewise of the details which attended the defeat and destruction of the emigrant army, according to the report thereof rendered by Tallien, who was in mission with the republican arm in that affair. Your claims have not been provided for in this treaty with Spain; relative to which claims I have heard nothing since mine to you of the 14th of June last. "Tis possible I may soon hear something on that subject, either from this Government or from Mr. Pinckney; in which case I will immediately advise you of it. It is likewise possible, and so not improbable, that the terms of friendship proposed by that Government, in case it will, no doubt, be the wish of the former to involve us it in her side. But this I hope will not take effect; because, under existing circumstances, it would not only produce many unhappy consequences, but because I am of opinion, if Mr. P. finds difficulties, that the object may be attempted a second time. Pardon my interruption, as so far as I am enabled to show that Mr. P. had at last stated nothing injurious to this republic. Doubtless France will now have great weight in the councils of Spain; and, most certainly, if we continue in friendship with France, and of which there can be no doubt, it will be possible to avail ourselves of it in support of our claims there.

Those two events, it is certain, will produce the most important consequences, as well in securing tranquility at home, as in putting off all remaining hope of success, on the part of the Powers still at war with this republic. Indeed the probability is that peace will soon be made with the Italian Powers, and even with Austria. But with England, so peculiar is the relation between the two countries, that it is impossible to say when peace will take place, or in what manner it will be concluded. It is the nature of this project to provide certain terms upon that point. An agreement, however, with all the other Powers, may possibly induce an accommodation between these sooner than present circumstances authorize the expectation of.

As to the time of the debarkation of the emigrant army, some symptoms were seen here which gave cause for suspicion that there was a party in Paris which wish, at least, to debark them. It is very probable that such a party exist. The Convention is still employed upon the subject of the constitution, which will probably be gone through in the course of two weeks more. As soon as it is adopted, and of which there can be no doubt, and upon the principles generally proposed in the project reported by the commission, I will forward you a copy.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, August 17th, 1796.

Sir: I have not been honored with any communication from you since that of the 2d May last, though, doubtless, others are on their way, and which I shall soon receive.

A few days since, Philadelphia papers were received as late as the 3d of July, containing Mr. Jay's treaty, together with such proceedings of the Senate upon it as were then published. As these gazettes are circulating everywhere, I conclude some of them are in possession of the committee of public safety, and that the contents of the papers which you allude to above were published in Havre. Of late I have heard nothing from the committee upon this subject, nor do I expect to hear anything from that body upon it, let the impression be what it may, otherwise than in reply to such communication as I may make thereon, and respecting which, it may be given to them, if I be induced to address myself to them upon the subject in question, as is, or will be, adopted in regard to it, and upon which, in its relation to the other members of the convention, I presume to be some time at Havre. In this I presume the conduct of the Convention will be particularly marked out, so I deem it my indispensable duty to avoid the interm in any, the slightest, compromitement either of you or myself upon that subject. I mention this because I think it possible that the Convention may have given to you the completely the final result of this business, so far as it depends on me, and it is indeed ought to be, under your control.

As I have had no communication with this Government upon the subject of this treaty since its contents were known, it is of course impolite for me to say what the impression it has made is. It is as easy for you, with the lights you have, to form a correct opinion upon that point in Philadelphia, as for me to do it here. One circumstance, however, I think proper to bring to your view. So soon after the British Government had recommenced the seizure of our vessels destined for the ports of France, it was notified to the convention by a secret representation, who had just returned from England, that he had been advised there, through a channel to be relied on, that the British administration had said they knew that measure would not be offensive to our Government; or, in other words, that it would not disturb the harmony of the two Governments, in consideration with contempt, and of course to hear that it was considered nearly in the same light by the committee itself.

But since the arrival of the treaty, I have understood that, in connexion with that report, the attention of many has been drawn with some degree of solicitude to the contents of the second paragraph of the 18th article, and who say that, as that article leaves the law of nations unsettled, and provides payment for seizures in cash, the said paragraph appears to be a very serious matter, and of course for those which are not contraband, whereas the complaints of our citizens are prevented, and of course by the British construction by implication countenanced, this republic has a right to complain of it. I mention this objection to you that you may be aware of it in case it should ever be brought forward on this or your side of the waters and that it will be brought forward, I think probably because such seizures are not noticed in the local papers; it is painful for me to give you a detail of this kind; but, being an interesting fact, I do not see with what propriety it can be withheld.

It is true, that the constitution will be completed in the course of a few days, and of which I will immediately afterwards forward you a copy. The discussion upon this very important subject has been conducted with great temper, and the harmony of opinion throughout greater than could have been expected.

The report of Pichon having crossed the Rhine, as heretofore intimated, was without foundation. The height of the waters, occasioned by continual rains, has hitherto prevented it. It is, however, said, that he has orders to cross it, and is now making the necessary movements for that purpose. The enemy are on the opposite side, watchful of his measures; but, from his skill, the strength and enterprise of his army, success is counted on as certain.

No indication presents itself of an approaching peace between France and England, or even of a negotiation for it. The Convention, and you likewise, know that the moment when that anxiety ceases, and especially if anything of a pecuniary nature is expected, the negotiation will commence, if it is not already in progress, and at the same time the opportunity of taking advantage of the French situation with contempt, in order to have the treaty signed, will be lost forever; for we have now a power in the hands of the people which, if not seized, will be lost. The funds of England, and the national character, are in the hands of the people.

If, however, I may be permitted to say so, the negotiation is not to be expected; for, as I presume the overture will come from England, so it is equally probable that none will be made from hence. The British administration is disposed to adhere to the terms of France. I presume, are fully upon that head, and immediately after the decision was taken, I cannot otherwise account why your letters have not reached me.

I sincerely wish to hear from you as soon as possible upon that subject; because, if, in the further pursuit of our claims upon England, it is found that the right is not possessed, or is possessible under the laws of nations; it is obvious, from a variety of considerations, that the sooner an attempt is made to adjust the mode whereby such aid is to be rendered, the better the prospect of success will be. You know that France viewed with anxiety the late negotiation with that Power, and waited the result without unpleasant apprehensions of the consequences. And you likewise know that the moment when that anxiety ceases, and especially if anything mingled in the cause producing the change, which argues an attachment for France, is the moment to make a suitable impression on their councils. Offences incidents of this kind in private life increase the friendship and cement the Union; but, if, in the course of a treaty, with nations who are not our friends, the Union is in the hands of the people. But the moment must be seized, otherwise the prospects diminish, and every day becomes more remote: for when a coolness, which has once taken place, is suffered to remain for any length of time, after the cause which gave birth to it ceases, that circumstance becomes a new motive for chagrin, and which, especially if afterwards increased by mutual visits, often ends in mutiny. In addition to which it may be observed that, if such aid is wished from France, the state of the war is such as to require, on our part, dispatch for it is always presumable, when its substantial objects are secured on the one side, and the hope of gain, in a great measure, abandoned on the other, as a fact not very distant. I am still of opinion that, if a timely and suitable attempt be made to engage the aid of this Government in support of our claims upon England, it may be accomplished, and upon fair and honorable terms. But, under existing circumstances, peculiar and extraordinary care becomes necessary in the arrangement to be adopted; otherwise the attempt will be in vain, and possess the confidence of this Government, or it will not support it: for no Government will support a negotiation it suspects will terminate in a treaty injurious to itself. For this purpose, then, the person to whom we commit the trust should possess the confidence of this Government, and, in my opinion, the negotiation should be carried on at the place where the French negotiation is carried on, either at Berlin, or at a place not distant from Paris, under the superintendence of a person who has, or not long since at Dieppe for an exchange of prisoners as it was said. On the contrary, suppose any person was sent directly to England on this business, what would be its effect here? It is admitted that such a person would be much more powerful than by having the right to act under the name of a representative, or a signification; but the manner would be deemed inharmonious, and would, of course, be considered as declining all claims upon this Government for its support. England would know this, and profit by it. Indeed, no co-operation, under such circumstances, would be presumed. What can be the objections to such an arrangement? I can see none. If we were at war with England none would be urged by any one: for such was the case when we were at war with her. If then, remaining at peace, another country is willing to give us the fortune of its arms, in support of our claims against a common enemy, ought we to decline an arrangement which would be adopted in war, especially with the two countries, that our armies will soon be engaged in, unabated by any effort of our own? Would it excite disgust in England? On the contrary it would command her respect, without compulsion we know we shall not gain from her what we are entitled to; and if this compulsion is to be procured from France, will it not be more efficacious when she sees that our harmony with France is complete, and broken relations with England? What is it we wish by harboring this Government, from any kind of negotiation we can set on foot, without any effort of our own; and if any such effort is to be made, of what kind must it be? To this I can give no answer, other than by referring you to your former letters on that head: for latterly I have had no communication with this Government on it. If it can be done, the above is the way to do it; but, to secure success, by engaging this Government with full zeal in our behalf, and striking terror into England, it will be necessary to lay hold of her property within the United States, take the posts, and even invade Canada. This would not only secure to us completely our claims upon Britain, and especially if we likewise cut her trade by land as well as by sea, but, by making a decisive and powerful diversion in favor of France, promote, and very essentially, a general peace.
The state of the war is the same as when I wrote you last. Pickering is still on this side of the Rhine, and the pressure upon Italy is less forcible since than it was before the peace with Spain; a circumstance which gives cause to suspect that negotiations, promising a favorable issue, are depending with the Powers in that quarter. A similar consideration may likewise have induced the Imperial Council at Vienna to proceed with caution in their discussions on the points of German politics. The Emperor himself, as well as several of his members separately, are negotiating for peace with this republic; of which latter fact we have lately seen an example in a treaty with the prince of Hesse-Cassel: whereby six thousand of his troops, in English pay, are withdrawn from the army of the Emperor.

The attempt which was hereby made, not simply to amend, but absolutely to set aside the former constitution, and introduce a new one in its stead, differing, too, from the former, in many of its great outlines, and especially in the character of its legislative and executive branches, under the circumstances which existed when it was commenced, being at the moment when the trial of Barrere and his associates was depending, and Paris afflicted by famine, was an enterprise, you will admit, of great moment. So far as it was a dangerous one it proves that such danger was encountered from more than one quarter, and that it is necessary to take care of this point, if we wish to avoid a recurrence of such ill effects.

The primary assemblies were convened to deliberate on it five days, and this is the fifth; and in those quarters from which I expect a ready reply, it appears that this measure, to a great majority, is as disagreeable as to a great majority. It was, likewise, submitted to the armies, and by whom it is said to be adopted almost unanimously.

If, in the prospect, therefore, in this respect, before this republic, one circumstance only presents itself which darkens, in any degree, the political horizon. In putting the new constitution in motion, the Convention wished to transfer from its own body two-thirds of its members to the legislative branches of the new Government, and for which a decree was passed. A motive for this was the advantage the republic would gain from keeping in office many of those in whose hands depending negotiations were, and who, in other respects, are acquainted with the actual state of things. There may be, and doubtless are, other motives for this measure, and which will really occur.

This arrangement, however, is disliked by many, and, particularly, by the inhabitants of this city, by whom it is generally rejected. The presumption is, that a great majority of France will approve the decree, and in which case Paris will yield; but, should the majority prove to be in the other scale, the presumption is equally strong that they would yield from fear, and as they would be unwilling, or unable, to attempt a resistance. Many, however, are of a different opinion, and count upon the division that exists upon this point, as the commencement of a counter-revolution. It is well known that the royalists are active, and using their utmost efforts to improve it in their favor; and it is also believed that England, and some other of the coalesced Powers, view with the most scrupulous jealousy the possible example which it may set for the royalists and those Powers to carry out every circumstance which turns up when the time is ripe to rest a hope in general, however, their calculations upon the fortune of the Revolution have not been verified by events, and I shall be deceived if this is not the case in the present instance. Indeed, as events are generally ready to yield to a new movement, is in this respect, from the point of the other Powers, nearly without impeaching her attachment to republican government. All the atrocities, which have stained the different stages of the Revolution, have been perpetrated here; under every convolution and change some of her citizens have suffered; and, with the preponderating party in the Convention, she is not popular as a department; so it is natural she would wish to exclude from theLegislature of the new Government all the members who compose the present Convention.

P.S. Respecting Algiers I will write you in my next.

Since writing the above, it is announced that Jouron, who commands the army of the Sambre and Meuse, has crossed the Rhine at the head of about fifty thousand men, and in the face of about forty thousand, well posted and strongly fortified, on the opposite shore. It is also said that he attacked and took by storm, immediately afterward, the city and castle of Dusseldorf. Dusseldorf is an important post for this bold exploit, and which is deemed, under the circumstances attending it, among the most brilliant of the war.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

SIR:

I herewith enclose you extracts from several letters from Mr. Cathalan, our consul at Marseilles, and by which it appears that the news of the defeat of the English, at Trafalgar, is confirmed. The English have likewise, it is understood, taken Bariere, the committee of public safety, who is charged with the American affairs, and by whom I am informed that like intelligence is received from their consul at Algiers; so that the verity of this report cannot be doubted. By these extracts, as by the communications of the consuls to the committee, as I am advised, it is to be inferred, that the movements of Mr. de Ruyter and his associate have been victorious in their object, that the aid of this republic was not extended to us in that negotiation. From what cause this proceeded, if such is the fact, I cannot at present determine; but presume it will be fully explained to you by Colonel Humphreys, from Lisbon; where he doubtless is before this, having left Paris, on his return there, three weeks since. It is, however, necessary for me to state to you what took place here in that respect, as to the cause of Colonel Humphreys' arrival, prior to the receipt of the above intelligence; as likewise what has been since done in consequence of that intelligence.

I was informed by Colonel Humphreys, upon your request, that you wished to obtain the aid of this Government in support of our communications with the Barbery Power; for which purpose, indeed, he had come, and that you wished me to ask for it, in case I thought it attainable. From particular considerations, and which will occur to you, I felt some embarrassment in making an application for aid of any kind at the present juncture; but as I was persuaded you had weighed them, and deemed them no obstacle, and knew the object was equally pressed by interests of the United States, and by the public, which is the reason I thought it proper to make this application to you, the idea being that it was not the aid of funds that we wanted, but simply the aid of amicable mediation and interference of this Government, and which was promised by our treaty of alliance, but never performed. Colonel Humphreys and myself are of opinion, that, as credit for the service was to be a principal motive, on the part of France, for embarking in it, it would be expedient on our part to make our arrangements such, as to give full force to that motive; since thereby we should engage in it with greater zeal, and, in consequence, with proportionably greater effect. It occurred to me, that the more direct our measures were, from this quarter, and the more united and harmonious our councils were, in respect to those which I suppose was to be done by this Government, and of which proceeding and that of France, and of course, the better our prospect of success. Besides, to give full effect to the influence of France in the councils of the Dey, and thereby obtain a peace at the cheapest rate, it appeared advisable that our agents should be clothed with a French passport, and if possible a French citizen, and even appear to be an agent of the French government. From motives of humanity, and chiefly from motives of humanity, in regard to our prisoners, whereby we should avoid inculcating any weight of our part (for wealth and impecuniosity are with them strong temptations for war) and which would be unnecessary for us, and to the great damage of our friends, I left the mode or manner of the negotiation open for subsequent and less formal discussion; seeking, in this step, only to give to the first point of aid, and which I was explicitly promised by the committee and the commission. I soon found, however, on touching on the other part, the execution, that our anticipation was correct, and that it was expected our agents would depart hence by the route of Marseilles, shunning the countries with which this republic was at war at which place the Government would have a verbal provision for him to proceed to Algiers. In the course of the object, I was furnished by the commissary with a list of such presents as would be suitable to Algiers, &c., a literal copy of what they had last presented themselves, with a specification of what suited the Dry and his ministers in particular, and which presents, as introductory, he advised us to commit to the agent, to be presented in the commencement, accord to the nature of the place, and as their counsel should advise.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

The breach which I lately intimated to you had taken place between several of the sections of this city and the Convention, respecting two decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor, and whose object was to transfer from the Convention so many of its members as would constitute two-thirds of the legislature of the new government, continued daily to widen, and at length all hope of amicable compromise was gone. A final appeal, therefore, was made to arms, and which took place on the 5th instant (13th Vendémiaire) and in which the Convention prevailed. The details of this contest, though very interesting, are not lengthy. In the morning of the 5th, a force was marshalled out by the revolting sections upon their respective parades, in concert, and under officers engaged the hall, prepared to await the issue of the day. The disposition, therefore, was that of besiegers against besieged, and when no further hope was left, or no offer of a parley for, on that of the Convention, taking the whole together, there were not more than six thousand; whilst on the side of the insurgents a number inconsiderable comparing with the numbers to be opposed, and a still greater body in arms, which was supposed to be on the same side, or at least neutral. The countenance, too, of the parties, bespoke a strong sympathy with their respective situation; that of those without, exhibited an air of cheerfulness and alacrity, and which nothing but the confidence of success could inspire, whilst that of those within was depressed and melancholy. The action commenced a little after five in the evening by the advance of the troops of the sections, and ended about ten by their retreat. Wherever they approached, they were repulsed by heavy charges of artillery and musketry, which ranged and cleared the streets of their columns as soon as possible, and which could not be driven from the windows of the neighboring houses; from whence, perhaps, more of the troops were slain than from any other quarter. The loss on either side is unknown, and perhaps will continue so; and the reports are so various and contradictory, that the greatest abundance of information is required on the disposition of the troops who were presented at the corners of streets, or when advancing by the head of the column only, and by the time and nature of the action, which was by intervals, I cannot think that more than five hundred were killed and wounded on both sides, though some of the reports make it as many thousands. It was generally understood by the assailants, that little or no opposition would be made, and that two of the principal regiments, that of particular, were on their side, and that they would so declare themselves when the crisis approached. But in this they were mistaken: for all those troops beheld with great bravery and intrepidity, acquiring themselves as they had done before on the Rhine, having been drawn from the army of the North. Indeed, the probability is, the report was only circulated to inspire the troops of the sections with confidence, and to produce a suitable impression on the citizens of Paris in general. Many circumstances occurred, in the course of the commotion, to countenance this idea; and it was not without great difficulty that M. Carnot, who was sent as a messenger from the Convention to the corps of the National Guard, could persuade it either to proceed to the Tuileries, or to return to its quarters, which it had abandoned, or feebly supported after the first onset, and repulse, which immediately followed; and after which, it was sustained principally by those who were really and truly the parties to it: for as such, the great bulk of those who were in the ranks ought not to be considered. This opinion is likewise countenanced by a train of incidents which developed itself as the movement proceeded, and which consequently depended on it.

The troops of the Convention kept their ground all night, being unwilling to press as far as they might have done the advantage gained, since it appeared that, by such pressure, they might fray more of their countrymen, but not gain the point. On the 17th of September, the decree was not issued, but the troops were not withdrawn; and it was then doubted whether they would have been permitted to remain at the Tuileries, if the London Express had not seen the fact, at 4 o'clock in the morning. The difficulty was increased by the darkness of the night or other circumstances favored, till finally none were left, except those who were not properly of that description. By the morn every thing was tranquil as if nothing had passed. At the entrance of every street you saw the pavements taken up, and wagons and other impediments obstructing the passage; but not a single person in the streets. The only thing that was remnant was the state of being, and the memory of Lepelletier, consisting of a few hundred only, and which had in part retired, and was returning to its commune as a place of retreat, rather than of defence. But now the scene began to change, and exhibit to you precisely the reverse of what was seen the day before—the besieged becoming the besiegers: for by this time the troops of the Convention have completely surrounded the commune of the Tuileries, and the department of the Marais, formerly on the great epoch of the 9th Thermidor, and of Berry, who made regular approaches, and by different routes, till finally this corps was completely surrounded. A peremptory summons was then sent to it to surrender, and the march of the army of the commune was continued. Thus it was this movement crushed, the authority of the Convention vindicated, and Paris restored to complete tranquility, and within less than twenty-four hours after the action commenced.

Such was the order, and such the issue of this contest—a contest, in many respects, the most interesting and critical that I have yet witnessed, and which promised, had the assailants succeeded, not perhaps essentially to impede or vary the direct course of the Revolution, but, most probably, to involve the nation in a civil war, open a new scene of carnage more frightful than any yet seen, and deluge the country by kindred arms with kindred blood. In this view, the character and object of the movement, on the part of the insurgents, merit some attention. Had the insurgents not been the logical consequences of the party that has been in power, of the crisis, controversy, and these you have. But to enable you to form a just estimate of its merits in other respects, and thereby of the probable views of the insurgents, it will be necessary for me to state other facts, and which preceded the final appearance of the insurgents, as far as I was able to know, according to a report of the Convention, by them adopted. But the verity of this report, of which I herewith send you a copy, was denied by the sections. By the report, however, you will perceive that the names of the departments voting for and against the decrees, were published some time since, and to which it may be added, that no department was in favor of the decrees, that it was for the commune, that it was for the insurgents, that it arised upon it, admitting that a majority of those who voted was in favor of the decrees, whether those who did vote for them constituted a majority of the French citizens entitled to vote, and upon which I cannot yet positively decide. But I am disposed to call the attention of the most critical and large-minded to the proceedings against the decrees. It is probable that some of the communies, foreseeing a storm gathering from that source, did not choose to vote for or against them, and therefore evaded the question by design; and it is certain that, in others, the people was understood by the people that the question was taken upon the constitution and the decrees together: for latterly, in the Convention, the Constitutionists, who generally voted with the royalists, have been, in order to prevent a misapprehension of what their real intention was. I send you, however, the several papers which illustrate this point, and by which you will be enabled to form as correct an opinion as on present lights will admit; observing, further, that the report made by the Convention respecting the decrees, was made, as you will perceive, at the same time with the report, that this committee of the commune was sitting in every commune, is making out for the satisfaction of the community large, and which was commenced by order of the Convention, immediately after the first was rendered. It is to be wished that this had been some time since published, but when it is recollected that the publication must contain the proceedings of upwards of seven thousand primary assemblies, many of which are, perhaps, lengthy, impartial people will perceive that it could not be soon done, especially when it is also recollected that the whole of the interval since the order was given, has been a time of unusual ferment and trouble.

The primary assemblies were to meet, and the day of meeting was not distant. The decrees, and the evidence of their adoption, were before France, and would, of course, be before these assemblies, nor were the electors bound by any legal penalty to regard them, if they thought they were not adopted, or even disapproved them. The presumption, therefore, was, (and especially if they discredited the report of the Convention,) that they would have the effects of the two-thirds of the present Convention, vote for whom they pleased: leaving it to those who were elected by the several departments, to the legislature of the new government, whether they were entirely new men, or partly so, to take it. It appears to me, that this has been the case among themselves, and with the Convention, who should constitute the legislature of that government; or whether the whole proceeding should be declared void, and a new election called for; and which, in that event, would most probably have been the case. But the party opposed to the Convention preferred a different series of measures whereby to forward its views; the details wherein, so far as I have any knowledge of them, I will now communicate.

The primary assemblies were to meet, by law, on the 10th of Fructidor, and dissolve on the 15th. In general, however, those of Paris prolonged their sitting beyond the term appointed; and many of them declared their sessions permanent, and exhibited, in other respects, a tone of defiance and great animosity towards the existing Government. Finally, however, the primary assemblies were dissolved; and, after which, the sections of Paris, to whom the same spirit was now communicated, became the channel, or rather the instruments of the same policy; many of whom, likewise, declared their sessions permanent, and assumed, in other respects, a tone equally uncompromising. A movement towards the commune of the Tuileries, towards the commune of the Montmartre, of Paris, and which always was, and still is, the theatre of the greatest gaiety and dissipation, took the lead in these counsels. At one time it presented an address to the Convention, copiously descanting upon the horrors of terror, demanding that those who were called terrorists should not only be inhibited the right of voting, but further proceed to the idea of doing their utmost to prevent their vote in the commune of the Tuileries. The council of the neighborhood not more than three thousand foot, and six hundred horse, and which there were for six months before.

At another time it placed, by its own arrer, under the safeguard of the primary assemblies, all those who had delivered their opinions in those assemblies, and invited the other sections of Paris to form a meeting of forty-eight commissioners, to declare to all France the sentiments of this commune upon the state of affairs in the present juncture. On the 10th Vendémiaire, this section resolved that a meeting of the electoral corps should be held at the theatre Francais on the next day, and admonished the other sections to take some concurrence; as the object of which was to elect or to resist elect, the commune of the Tuileries, on the necessity of the case. A partial meeting was, in consequence, held there, and which continued its sitting for some time after a proclamation was issued by the Convention, ordering the electors to disperse. Indeed, it was not without great difficulty that it was seen read before the Convention, which was done, before it was gone before he arrived. On the 12th, this section issued other inflammatory arrrets; and on the night of the 12th, another fruitless attempt was made by the Government to surround the commune of the section and secure its members; for which General Menou, the Commandant of the guard, to support the proclamation; but they were gone before he arrived. On the 13th, this section issued other inflammatory arrrets; and on the night of the 12th, another fruitless attempt was made by the Government to surround the commune of the section and secure its members; for which General Menou, who was the leader in this attack, was degraded from the command transferred to Barras. On the 13th, the catastrophe took place, and ended as I have already stated.
That the party in question meant to subvert the Revolution, and restore the ancient monarchy, and that the destruction of the latter was the object of those who formed the former, has been the opinion of all who have had occasion to accomplish it, cannot be doubted. A slight attention only to the above facts sufficiently demonstrates the truth of this assertion in all its parts. Even in the primary assemblies a ground was taken incompatible with the present system. Some free latitude, it is true, the people have a right to take in those assemblies, however limited or special their character; but the Revolution, as it now stands, is far from acting in harmony with the electoral corps, in contempt of the law, and in defiance of the Convention, the case was altered. From that moment rebellion was announced in form, and the sword of civil war was completely unshackled. And the Convention was restored! the Convention survived, or without a counter revolution, otherwise than by reducing the revolting sections to order. Fortunately the latter view is the one that has since progressed as the friends of the Revolution have wished. The revolted sections were immediately afterwards disarmed, and without opposition, and the electoral corps is now legally convened, (those of it who have not already (abolition, re-election, etc.) and with a disposition to be more observant of the decrees, and accommodating to the existing Government.

But, if this party had succeeded in its attack upon the Convention, what would have followed? Would it likewise have succeeded in the other object, to which this was only a step? A conjunctural answer can only be given to a conjunctural question. In 1797, the impression had been made that the insurrection in the different departments would really be, at least to that stage, by a considerable portion. At the head of this corps was already placed the old ci-devant Duke of Nivernois—a man not without some literary merit, and whose character had been so free from enthusiasm, that the populace were not impressed, and who, in fact, is called the reign of Robespierre, a fit subject for the guillotine, yet he survived that reign, and received his life as a boon from those who were now threatened with destruction. It was said he declined the presidency; but it is also believed that his modest disqualification was more the effect of an accurate calculation of chances in the great game that was going on. It is not possible to say how the blow would have fallen, but that the majority of the corps, many of whom were likewise ci-devant nobles, was believed to be of the same principles. The nation would therefore have beheld, on the one side, the Convention overthrown, perhaps massacred, and whose members were sworn to behead the king; and on the other, a corps, at its head, and which it would, of course, conclude was decidedly of opposite political principles the latter advanced forward upon the ruin of the former, and in some sort possessed of the reins of government. Surely no opportunity more favorable to the views of the royalists could have been sought, than this would have presented. How they meant to improve, how they would have placed them in that situation, is not known, nor is it probable it will be: for it is to be presumed that, whatever the plan was, admitting there was one already formed for such an event, it had been concerted by the leaders only, and was not to be unfolded until after the sections were thus far plunged into the same atrocity with themselves. There were two ways by which this opportunity might have been improved; the first, by seizing the king himself, by force, or by agreement of all the departments to do the same, for the purpose of putting the constitution in motion. Had the first been adopted, the nation would, doubtless, have been greatly confounded, and, in the moment of dismay, the royalists would, most probably, have come forward, and the patriots lain, as has been the case, it is to be presumed, that some events would have been seen, and, perhaps, even in some of those sections which were foremost in the revolt; many of whose citizens had joined the opposition from principle, in respect to the right of suffrage; some because they had been persecuted, or censured as terrorists, and only because they were patriots; and others because they doubted the patriotism of those who had been elected, and their conduct when elected. All this would have happened before the motion was taken, when they heard that a king was proclaimed, and would have looked back with horror at the scene through which they had passed.

By this time, too, some of the armies would have been seen advancing towards Paris, and which would most probably have had little to do: for I am persuaded that, as soon as the citizens recovered from the extravagance into which they had been betrayed, they would be among the first to fall upon their betrayers. Had the second been adopted, it is probable it would have secured the elections in favor of the royalists; the decrees would of course have been annulled, and the new constitution, such as it had been, would have been a far more dangerous object seen by the people, and, being seen, half the danger would have been provided against. In the memory of those who were friendly to the Revolution, and the catalogue of its friends must be a long one, counting those only whose fathers and sons were slaughtered in its defence on the frontiers, the destruction of the Convention, under whose banners they had bled, would form a mural cause that would hang heavy on the shoulders of the subsequent administration. The manner of the suffrage, though in form free, would be deemed an usurpation, and the slightest deviation afterwards become a signal for revolt. If they used their power with violence, the same effect would be produced as if it were immediately proclaimed, and if they used it with moderation, they might perhaps have prevented the calamity of another crisis; and whiling away in office the time allotted by the constitution, be enabled, in the interim, so far as to effect the memory of what was passed, as to secure themselves afterwards a retreat which would exempt them from punishments but in neither case would they be able to restore the ancient monarchy. You will perhaps say, that the saving of Paris, by the | forces of the throne, is not less dangerous to the liberties of the citizens of Paris are so likewise; and that the farmers, or cultivators in general, if not decidedly in favor of the Revolution, thought in my opinion they are, are at least not against it; and which belief, though erroneous, is the root of the present condition of affairs. Admitting this to be the case, it will still be the same thing.

But you will ask, if Paris is on the side of the Revolution, how happened that such a force was formed against the Convention, whilst so small a one was marshalled on its side? Let us first establish facts and then reason from them. Paris consists of forty-eight sections, and of which eight only were actually in arms against the Convention, there for it, and the others neutral. Of those, too, who were sent by the eight sections, it is presumable, from the peremptory manner of their retreat, and the ease with which they were afterwards disarmed, as likewise by their uniform declarations at the time and since, that the greater number did not expect to be led against the Convention or, if they were not, that the retreat was very, very easily, and without much of actual hostility was inconsiderable; and this too, it was, said in part composed of the most fearful section, others from quarters, and, in some instances, even of foreigners. Still, however, there was an actual revolt by those sections, and at best a neutrality on the part of the others; the three who declared themselves for the Convention either went there for it, or, if they were not, the retreat was very, very easily, and without much of actual hostility was inconsiderable; and particularly that of Lepeletier, is certain. But that this was not the case with many is presumable. It is well known that the inhabitants of Paris, in general, wished to get rid of their present deputies, and for reasons heretofore explained. The opposition to the decrees of the Convention may be accounted for, and with the greater propriety, because it is certain they were opposed, and even by the royalists, upon republican principles, the unalterable right of suffrage, etc., and by which an impression was made in the primary assemblies upon the audience, and thence gradually extended throughout the city. In the primary assemblies, too, every person was allowed to speak; and it happened that, among the royalists, there were some good speakers, and who, by taking popular ground, en
The vessel by which this will be forwarded will not sail until a general movement, such as now exists, shall have been completed; and a Correspondence of adopted principles and purposes now awaits the conclusion of the meeting. On the day after to-morrow, the new Government is to convene, and the prospect is now favorable that it will then convene, and precisely upon the ground stated in the preceding letter. Some symptoms were lately seen which gave cause for apprehension that the expiring moments of the present regime might be spent in an agitation of that sort; but the个国家 of the states of the Union will be most unperturbed, doing from causes connected with the late movement; and happily these are over, without producing any serious effect. A commission of five was appointed to make a supplemental report respecting that movement, and it was expected by many that it would be received by a protracted committee of the Senate, and that the proposal would be carried out by the state in the same manner as the previous one, by the nobly and probably, also, in the arrears of several deputations, but that commission has freed every one from uneasiness on that account, by a report just made; and which proposes only some new provisions for the trial of offenders in that movement, and others in several of the departments, who have committed various acts of violence, sedition, and the like, and of the treaty itself, which was the main object of the whole proceeding; and of which the committee may entertain the idea that it may, I shall find that the same amicable and dispassionate counsels still prevail towards us that have been shown for some time past, to inculcate which disposition, not only by the documents and lights derived from your own, but by such others as my own reflections and some other opinions, of which the general character has been, and be assured will continue to be, equally the object of my most earnest wishes, and undergiving efforts.
Lately, Jourdan received a check on the other side of the Rhine, and which occasioned his falling back to the Rhine, upon which river both his and the French armies are posted. The cause of this is not distinctly known, but certain it is, that the duty of the military section of the committee of public safety has been since arrested, upon a suspicion of treachery; as are three others, upon a charge of treasonable correspondence with their enemies; but with what propriety I do not pretend to determine. It is worthy of remark, that it was known in England and in Basle, before it happened, that there would be a movement here at the time it happened; at which time, too, the Count d'Artois landed from England upon the Isle of Dieu, near the French coast, opposite the Vendée, where he still is.

A report was yesterday made to the Convention, of an important advantage gained in a encounter in the Mediterranean, in which the French took a ship of the line and damaged greatly two others; and likewise took fourteen merchant ships, richly laden, and estimated at an enormous sum. Two other advantages in other quarters are spoken of, still more signal than this, but not by authority.

Mr. Monroe is returned; but whether by order of the French Government, (as I suspect, and in consequence of the fortunate issue of the late movement) or the failure of his mission, be it what it may, is uncertain. Be assured, if Mr. Jay's treaty is ratified, it will excite great discontent here. Of this, however, I shall be able to speak with more certainty after the new Government is organized.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, November 5, 1795.

Sir:

On the 27th ultimo the Convention ended its career, by declaring that its powers ceased; and immediately afterwards the installation of the new Government began in the same hall, by a verification of the powers of its deputies, and their distribution into two branches, according to the mode prescribed in the constitution; and which was completed in that and the succeeding day. It was found upon inspection, that the decrees heretofore noticed were universally obeyed, and that, of the two-thirds of its legislative branches who were to be taken from among the members of the Convention, one branch was elected by the departments, so that the duty imposed upon those who were elected, of supplying the deficiency by their suffrage, became proportionately more easy and less objectionable. This, therefore, was immediately executed by ballot; and, after which, the interior organization of each branch followed, and which took up a day or two only; then the members of the directory, or executive, were chosen, and which was done on the 21st ultimo, and whereby the new Government was completely formed.

When I observe that the scene, which was exhibited upon this great occasion, resembled, in many respects, what we see daily acted on our side of the Atlantic, in our National and State Assemblies, you will have a better idea of the tranquility which reigned throughout, than I can otherwise describe. Nor shall I be accused of an unbecoming partiality, if I draw, from the increasing similitude in their and our political institutions, which this constitution and other proceedings furnish, the most favorable hopes of the future prosperity and welfare of this republic.

The adoption of a new constitution, founded upon the equality of rights of human beings, with its legislative powers distributed into two branches, and other improvements in the executive and judiciary departments, though still perhaps imperfect, yet certainly far beyond what past experiments here gave reason to expect, is an event of great importance, not only to France, but perhaps to mankind in general. Its complete inauguration, too, assures us that its merits will be tried; though, indeed, under the existing circumstances of a war with the neighboring Powers, who are interested in its overthrow by a strong party within, incessantly laboring to promote the same object; together with the derangements of the finances and other embarrassments which were inseparable from the difficulties they had to encounter; the experiment ought not to be called a fair one. If, however, it does succeed, and the republican system is preserved here, notwithstanding the various and complicated difficulties which opposed its establishment, and still shakes its foundation, it will certainly furnish a complete refutation of all those arguments which have been, in all ages and nations, urged against the practicability of such a Government, and especially in old countries.

Revellière, Lepaux, Rewbell, Sieyes, Le Tourneur, and Barras are elected into the directory; and who are all distinguished for their talents and integrity, as likewise their devotion to the Revolution; a circumstance which not only furnishes reasonable ground whereon to estimate the principles of those who choose them, but which will likewise tend essentially to give stability to the Republic itself. I write you at present only to communicate this important event, and will hereafter, as heretofore, keep you regularly advised of what shall appear to me to merit communication.

P. S. Sieyes has declined accepting his seat in the directory, and Carnot is appointed in his stead. Mr. Fauchet is lately arrived, and as he appears to be extremely dissatisfied with Mr. Jay's treaty with Great Britain, and is, apparently, well received by his Government, I doubt not his communications on that head will be attended to.

Mr. Pickering to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 23, 1795.

Sir:

The office of Secretary of State is yet vacant. I write now merely to acknowledge the receipt of your several letters, numbered 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21.

You will see an answer to the last has been anticipated, by a long letter from me, dated in September, on the subject of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain. By that letter, you will understand that the ideas you have detailed are quite founded by the representations of the Government of the United States.

You suggestions in regard to Mr. Parish, our consul at Hamburg, have led me to request Mr. Adams of a request formerly made to him, to inquire into his conduct, and report the same to this Department. Such I understand to be the fact, and that no report has yet been received.

I am, sir, TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, December 6, 1795.

Sir:

I was lately honored with originals and triplicates of your favors of the 19th and 14th of September last.* The duplicates are yet to be received. By the first of these letters, I learn that the President has ratified the late treaty with England; and by the second, the measures taken to vindicate our territorial rights, that were violated by the captain of a British frigate, in an attempt to seize Mr. Fauchet, the late French minister, within our jurisdiction, on his return home; and to which communications due regard shall be paid, as occasion requires.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

That the treaty was ratified, was a fact well established here, before the receipt of your favor. It was, indeed, generally credited before the arrival of Mr. Fauchet, by whom it was confirmed, and afterwards doubted by none. As I had no reason to presume, from any communication from your Department, that the contrary would be the case, so I had never calculated on the contrary; nor had I given this Government any reason to calculate on the contrary; having left it to form its own judgment on that point, according to its own lights; but, in this respect, I have nothing whereunto to reproach myself on the score of discretion.

The effect which this incident produced in the councils of this Government, through its several stages, may be traced in my communications to you. To the very end, I beg to refer you. To these, I have at present nothing material now to add. Symptoms of discontent, it is, true, are still seen; but whether they will assume an aspect more unpleasant, I know not. If they do, or any thing occurs of sufficient importance to merit your attention, I will certainly apprise you thereof, without any delay.

You likewise saw, by my former communications, that I understood and acted upon that part of my instructions, which explained the object of Mr. Jay's mission to England, differently from what it appears, by your favor of the 12th of September, and by Mr. Randolph's of the 1st of June preceding, it was intended I should understand and act upon the idea that the general principle was placed in the course of considering alliances, and which, indeed, I am not yet perhaps fully extricated, though I hope and think I am. Upon this head, I have only now to observe, that, as soon as I had reason to believe that Mr. Jay's instructions embraced objects which I had before thought they did not, I protested against them, as having been heard, and acted accordingly. I kept out of view the far off day, to which I wish a pleasure add, that I have never heard the least intimation on it since. In reviewing this particular trait in my conduct here, you will, I doubt not, do me the justice to observe, that when I made the suggestion alluded to, it was not rashly, nor without due regard to the actual state of our affairs at the time) I was called on to make it by considerations the most weighty, and which ought not to have been dispensed with; considerations, however, which I now forbear to repeat, having heretofore sufficiently unfolded them.

I have the pleasure to enclose you the report of Mr. Skipwith, upon the subject of the claims of many of our citizens who were heretofore injured by the occurrences of the war, and in consequence entitled to indemnities, and by which you will find that many of those claims are settled, and derive useful information in respect to others.

I likewise send you a letter from Mr. Pinckney, explaining the regard to the charge exhibited against him by your Department. As Mr. Fenwick has always proved himself to be an useful, indeed a valuable, officer in the station he holds, and as the error imputed to him might be the effect of judgment only, and which I think it was, I have thought I could not better forward your views, or the interest of my country, than by confining him in the discretion of the present affair. I have, at this officer's request, the honor to offer you, and to conduct with you on the subject, so that the interval will not be great before I have the decision in question, and which will, of course, be duly executed.

Two days since, Count Carletti, minister from Tuscany, was, in consequence of some offence given him by the Government, ordered to depart from Paris in forty-eight hours, and the bounds of the republic in eight days. It is said the offence consisted in a demand made to visit the daughter of the late King, of whom he spoke in terms of considerable commiseration, and which was thought to be not only an interference in concerns exclusively their own, but to have thrown some reproach on the French Government. The count, I hear, departs to-night, by way of Marseilles.

Soon after the Government was organized, the minister of foreign affairs announced a day on which the directors would receive the ministers of foreign Powers and who were requested to rendezvous for that purpose at his house, to proceed thence to that of the directors. We did so, and were presented, without regard to precedence, to that body, and whose president addressed the whole diplomatic corps in a short discourse, the principal object of which was, to assure it of the cordiality with which it was welcomed here by the representatives of the French people, which he contrasted with that which he had experienced in another country, and which, he said, was now free from all partiality, not formal. It is only to the latter circumstance merely to contradict the account given of the address by the journalists, and who made a particular speech for the president to each minister.

Manheim has certainly fallen again into the hands of the Austrians, with the garrison; the amount of which is not known, but presumed to be several thousand. But, in Italy, the fortune of the war is on the side of France; for the same day which announced the capture of Manheim, announced likewise a great and decisive victory over the Austrians in the other quarter. The details of the killed and wounded are also not yet accurately known; but it is understood that four or five thousand are taken prisoners, many slain, and the whole army put completely to rout.

Since the organization of the new Government, the character and deportment of all the departments are essentially improved. The legislative corps, in both its branches, exhibits, in the manner of discussion, a spectacle wonderful even in its favor, when compared with what was daily seen in the late Convention. And the executive departments begin to show an energy which grows out of the nice partition of their duties, and the greater responsibility that belongs to each. In truth, the vibration from the system of terror had, by the force of moral causes, gone far, and produced so deep an effect, as to have greatly relaxed the whole machine of Government. It was necessary, therefore, to put the people and ceremony of the ancient court, with which, he said, was not a little foreign, and now a very considerable one, in order to turn it to some account. If, in directing the attention this latter circumstance merely to contradict the account given of the address by the journalists, and who made a particular speech for the president to each minister.

Mr. Pinckney has, I hear, closed his business in Spain to his satisfaction, and is now on his route back, intending to take Paris in his way. I trust this report is, in every respect, well founded; of which, however, you will doubtless be corrected inform me before this reaches you.

P. S. Count Carletti has notified to the French Government that he cannot depart without the consent of his own.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, December 25, 1795.

Six:

Since my last, I was favored with yours of the 9th of October, and a quadrapuplicate of that of the 12th of September by which latter, the original and triplicate were before acknowledged.

Since my last, too, I have received a note from the minister of foreign affairs, complaining of the conduct of Mr. Pinckney in France, in having invited the Comte de Vergennes to embark in vessels from the Spanish ports, without the consent of the French Government, and acting in all cases as the English agent; a copy of which note, and of my reply, are herewith forwarded. I hear, also, that his conduct was even more reprehensible than is stated by the minister: for that he not only equipped the emigrants, but did it in American bottoms, with a view of protecting them under our flag. In telling the minister of his misbehavior, I did not think proper to point out, nor state, the circumstances under which the affair happened, nor the condition of the vessel, or the character of the master, as a man who has been characterized by the French as a respectable merchant, and has been represented to me, and the latter known to the President as Captain of artillery in the late war, and lately as vice consul at Canton, in China, have requested me to communicate to you their wish to obtain an appointment in the consulate, to Mr. the respectability of persons of other European ports connected with the trade of France; and that I have reason to believe they would, either of them, be happy to accept the appointment in question. In case Mr. Parish is removed, permit me further to suggest the propriety of giving to his successor two commissions; one for Hamburg, and the other for Altona, in the name of Mr. Parish, as Benjamin Jarvis and Thomas Randall, both of New York, the former a respectable merchant, as has been represented to me, and the latter known to the President as Captain of artillery in the late war, and lately as vice consul at Canton, in China, have requested me to communicate to you their wish to obtain an appointment in the consulate, to Mr. the respectability of persons of other European ports connected with the trade of France; and that I have reason to believe they would, either of them, be happy to accept the appointment in question. In case Mr. Parish is removed, permit me further to suggest the propriety of giving to his successor two commissions; one for Hamburg, and the other for Altona, in the the influence of the Emperor, and is therefore a less eligible port for mercantile transactions, and especially those connected with France.

I sent you, with my last, a report of Mr. Skipwith upon the cases submitted to his care for adjustment with this Government, and shall continue to give him all the aid in my power in those cases which remain unsettled, and apply your regularity of the progress.

Departures: Mr. Franklin, French, and Mr. Pinto, Spanish, shall certainly be paid.

At present, no symptoms of an approaching peace are to be seen, unless, indeed, the most vigorous preparations for the continuance of war may be deemed such, and which sometimes happens. The directory has called on the Legislature, for a supply of 800,000 men, which would have been raised by the subscriptions paid in the form of a loan; of which I send you a copy. The greatest possible injunctions are making by that body, and which seem to be supported by the Legislature, in putting the armies, the fleets, and the interior, into the best possible order; and so far as I can judge from appearances, these exertions seem to produce the effects that are desirable. War is the condition of Europe, and from which they cannot be extricated, without, I think, their severest anxiety, for they do not, they command respect. It is said, that Piccheu and Jourdan have lately gained several important advantages over the Austrians, in actions, which, though not general, were nearly so; and that, in the result, they have resumed their station before Mayence. The former part of this report is, I believe, to be depended on; the latter wants confirmation. The course of their exertions is, to keep up successes in those quarters, indeed, since the victory mentioned in my last, they have met with but little opposition.

Latterly the views of Prussia have become more doubtful than they were before. The conduct of Prince Hohenlohe, who, contrary to the neutrality of the German States, during the retreat of the former, and who were stationed there to preserve the line of neutrality in favor of Prussia, it is said, could scarcely be deemed neutral. For the civilities which were shown by him to the Austrians upon that occasion, it is said, he has been rewarded since by some complimentary attention from the Emperor. The Dutch appear apprehensive that the King of Prussia will seek suitable opportunity, if any offers, to favor the restoration of the stadtholder; and it is possible the conduct of the Prince Hohenlohe, above referred to, may have increased that suspicion, by giving an insight into what might be the views of the Prussian cabinet, in case the retreat had continued; or any great reverse of fortune should hereafter befall the French arms. It is certain, however, that momentous difficulties are always so much at hand, and that those, upon some occasions, suspicion is thrown upon those who do not deserve it.

The Count Carletti, late envoy, &c., from Tuscany, left Paris some four or five days since. He had refused going until he had heard from the Grand Duke and remained, notwithstanding the reiterated orders of the directory. Finally, however, he was ordered to depart in twenty-four hours, (this was not done before as I stated in my last) with intimation that force would be used to compel him, in case he did not. He still held out, however, the flag of defiance. The twenty-four hours expired, at which moment a commissary, with a carriage from the Government, waited to receive his person. In other words, in case the Count be not at Havre, the Austrian minister, says a safe beyond the bounds of the republic; which was accordingly done. The diplomatic corps was summoned, by a member either averse to this peremptory mode of proceeding, or friendly to the Count, to interfere with the directory in his behalf. There were seven members of that corps of opinion, that, although sometimes a demand is made on the Government of a minister who gives offence, to recall him, yet there is no obligation on the Government offended, by the law of nations, to take that course; but that it may take any other, and even upon slight occasions, to rid itself of him, more prompt and summary, if it thinks fit; and, in consequence, no step was taken by the diplomatic corps on the subject.

I inclose you, also, a note from the minister of foreign affairs, complaining of the seizure and condemnation of the corvette Cassius; which, he says, is in violation of the treaties between the two republics; and to which I replied, that I would present the subject to your attention; and doubted not I should be enabled to give a satisfactory answer thereon.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.
Paris, January 6th, 1796.

Some weeks past, the property of William Vans, a citizen of the United States, was attacked by Joseph Sand, another citizen of the said States, in a tribunal of France at Havre; where the cause was sustained, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff. From this judgment the defendant appealed to the superior tribunal of the department of Havre; to which the two parties applied for redress. As soon as the suit commenced, Mr. Vans applied for my interference, proposing to say, before the court, that the two parties are citizens of the United States, at the instance of a fellow-citizen, from the tribunals of the country; the cognizance of such controversies being, as he supposed, thereby exclusively vested in the consuls of each nation, within the jurisdiction of the other. I examined attentively the convention, and was of opinion, that the construction insisted on by Mr. Vans was sound; but that the plaintiff made a mistake in principle, and is of opinion that the defendant is not entitled to decline any interference in it, till I had your instruction. He continued, however, to press me; saying that if such was the import of the article, it was vested in him a right which I ought to secure him the enjoyment of; the deprivation of which, too, in the present instance, would be his ruin: for that the execution of the judgment by the sale of the merchandise attacked at Havre, where there was no demand for it, would not only subject him to a severe loss, but that he was likewise sued for the same sum in America, and where judgment would probably, likewise, be rendered against him. Finally, therefore, I did apply in his behalf, by a letter to the minister of foreign relations, of which I send you a copy, explaining my idea of the import of the treaty in the case in question; and requesting that the Executive (so far as depended on that branch, and provided it concurred with me in opinion) might cause the same to be executed; and to which I have yet received no answer, though I am assured verbally, that the directory concurs with me in the construction; and that a correspondent instruction thence will be given by the minister of justice, to the effect that the suit now is with whom it will probably be decided. I state this case to you, I apprehend how it is the wish of the President I should act in cases of the kind in future, and even in the present one, if not finally settled before I hear from you; and which may probably happen. If it is wished that such cases be allowed to the courts of the country, I doubt not such a practice will be agreeable to this Government; but if the contrary is preferred, you will, I presume, see the necessity of prescribing, by the suitable practice, how the consular courts are to be held, how their process is to be executed, and appeals conducted.

As connected with this subject, permit me to call your attention to another, upon which I likewise wish to be instructed. For the port of Havre there are at present two consuls, or rather a consul and a vice consul: both of whom, Mr. Cutting and Mr. Lamotte, are recognized by this Government. Was it intend the latter commission should cease, it would exist, then, only with Mr. Cutting, who has been dormant only when the consul is present? I wish to know in what light I am to consider these appointments, since thereby I shall likewise know to whom I am to look for the performance of the consular duties of this port.

A third one of the same kind occurs, and which I wish to mention to you. Sometime since, Mr. Picaire was appointed consul at Paris, in place of Mr. Pinto. I believe it may be proper to mention to you further, some considerations, growing out of his character as a British subject, and the actual state of things here, which made it inexpedient to demand his recognition of this Government, until after they were weighed, and I, in consequence, was not at liberty to state it, like Mr. Pinto, as I have before stated in the last. I have May last, and to which, as yet, I have received no answer. As Mr. Picaire probably expects to hear from me on this topic, I shall thank you for information of what I am to say to him, and how I am to act in that respect.

* Both of these gentlemen are men of merit and great respectability. I wished only the principle settled.
The collection of the forced loan continues, and will, I think, succeed. But what its product will be, is a point upon which there is a diversity of opinion. Some think it will fall short of the sum at which it was estimated, whilst other carry it much beyond that estimation. Certainly, however, it is, that by means thereof the embarrassments of the present already present must be greatly diminished, and that of a more complete system of finances which subject is now under consideration of the council of five hundred.

About the twenty-fifth of December last, a truce was asked by the Austrian Generals Wurmer and Clairfait, of Pechgau and Jourdan, for three months, and granted, subject to the will of the directory, by whom, it is said, it was allowed for only the report, at first circulated, that it was wholly rejected, being without foundation. Whether it will be prolonged, admitting the term as stated to be correct, is unknown, as likewise is the motive of Austria in asking, or of France in granting it. The presumption is, it was to try the experiment of negotiation in the interim; and such is the report. And it is likewise presumable, that such an experiment was made or is now making; but, from what I can learn, there is little prospect of its producing a peace. It will be difficult to part Austria from England, whilst the latter supplies the former with money to carry on the war, and which she will probably continue to do, whilst she carries it on herself. The present prospect, therefore, is, that Europe is destined to sustain the waste and havoc of another campaign, for, superior as England is at sea, and all other parts of the world at land, to the Austrian conquest of the Cape of Good Hope, it is not probable, if she escapes an internal convulsion, the symptoms of which have diminished of late, that she will restore everything on her part, and leave France in possession of the Belgic, and some of the Dutch provinces, such as France, and the directory, and the peace commission, of which they have hitherto been, the subject of serious communication with England, will make any sacrifice in favor of the Emperor: whether, in short, she would agree to restore the possessions taken by her from France and Holland, as a consideration for the restoration of the Belgic to the Emperor. It is even added, that intimations have been made by her, that, if France will leave her in possession of her conquests from Holland, she will restore everything taken from France, and leave her in possession of St. Domingo and the Belgic. If this be true, and it be credited by the Emperor, it will certainly tend to weaken, and perhaps absolutely to dissolve the connexion between England and Austria.

I communicated to you, in two preceding letters, the application of Count Carlotti, minister from Tuscany, for permission to visit the unfortunate young princess, &c., and the displeasure that which demand gave to the directory, who suspended his powers immediately, ordered him to leave the republic forthwith, and, finally, sent him, by force, beyond its limits. It was apprehended, by many, that this peremptory mode of proceeding would give offence to the Grand Duke; the contrary, however, was the case; for, as soon as he heard of the transaction, he despatched another envoy to the directory, to dissuade the demand of Carlotti, and declare his respect for the French Government, and such was the solicitude for his hasty departure, that he actually departed without the ordinary credentials, bearing simply a letter of introduction from the Grand Duke himself. Thus, therefore, this business has terminated, without giving any injury to the French republic, whilst it is a proof of the energy of its councils, and of its decision upon the delicate subject to which it refers.

On the 21st instant, being the anniversary of the execution of the late King, the members of the legislative corps of the directory, and all public officers, took a new and solemn oath to support the constitution, and not, rather, of hatred to royalty. The directory gave, on the same day, what is called a feit in the champ de Mars, where an amphitheatre was erected, and from whence the President, surrounded by the other members, and all the policy of the Government, delivered an oration suited to the occasion, to a numerous audience. It seems to be the policy of the existing Government to revive the zeal of the people in favor of the republic, and of the revolution; and measures of this kind are certainly well calculated to produce that effect.

P. S. Since writing the above, I have heard, through a channel that merits confidence, that the term of the truce is prolonged, and which strengthens what I intimated above, that a negotiation is depending with Austria. The recent departure, too, of one of the Dutch ministers for a conference, with the directory, and where took place about the time the truce was, probably, prolonged, is a circumstance which I think proper to communicate, since it gives cause to suspect, if a negotiation is depending, it treats for a general, and not a partial peace.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, February 16th, 1796.

I think it my duty to state to you, and without delay, a communication made me yesterday by the minister of foreign affairs of a visit of a very interesting nature. I called to request him the distress of several of my countrymen, occasioned by the protest, at Hamburg, of bills given them for supplies rendered the Government, and to request his aid with the directory to obtain them relief. This application was intended to harmonize with one that was making informally by our consul general, with the directory, and which was arranged, in order to determine the demands of the claimants before that of Paris, and in a form that might not wound its feelings. But, before I entered on this subject, my attention was called to another, more important, and upon which he seemed pleased with the opportunity of addressing me. He observed that the directory had, at length, extraordinary effort to repair to the United States, to declare to our Government the dissatisfaction of this, in respect to our treaty with Great Britain, had penetrated me with the deepest concern, because I feared, from a measure so marked and conspicuous, the most serious ill consequences, both to them and to us. I stated to him that such a mission was calculated to make an impression in America, and throughout the world; not only that they were dissatisfied with us, but, that even the issue of war and peace was suspended on the issue of the mission—their and our enemies would rejoice at the event, whilst theirs and our friends would behold the spectacle with horror: that the mission itself would place both republics in a new dilemma, and, from which, they could not both well extricate themselves with honor; that something was due, in the opinion of the world, to the character of the mission—its success must be brilliant, or the public would be disappointed, and this might induce them to insist on terms they would not otherwise have thought of, and which would increase their mutual embarrassments; that, as soon as the mission was known to foreign powers, they would commence their intrigues to make it the means of separating us; that all were interested in our separation, not only in our union; and, that our separation was an evil to be deprecated by every means in our power; and, that, if the directory entered on this course, we should not think it strange that we had never confided in the friendship of any power but in that of France, so I was satisfied they had no real friend except America; that republics could never count upon the friendship of monarchies; if they did count upon it they would be always deceived. Peace there might be, but peace and friendship did not always mean the same thing.

I observed further, that France had gained credit by her late conduct towards us. For whilst England had seized our vessels, and harassed our trade, she had pursued an opposite, and more magnanimous policy; and which had produced, and would continue to produce, a correspondent effect, by increasing our resentment against England, and attachment to France. But as soon as the latter should assume an hostile or menacing deportment towards us, would this motive diminish, and the argument it furnishing lose its force? That by this, however, I did not mean to be understood, as adding that the well founded suspicions, if not, admitted, or were thought to exist, should be withheld; on the contrary, I was of opinion, they should be brought forward, as well to obtain redress where it was wished, and could be given, as to make known, in a frank and friendly manner, the sentiments which each entertained of the conduct of the other, in case that were interesting to it. That on my own part, I was always ready to enter into such explanations, when required, and would do it in the present instance with pleasure; since, by being possessed of our view of the subject, they would be better able to decide, whether the complaint was well or ill founded, and of course how far it merited to be considered in that light. In short, I used every argument that occurred, to divert the Government from the measure proposed, assuring him, in the manner I have mentioned, that I was satisfied it would produce no good effect to France; on the contrary, that it would produce much ill both to her and to us.

The minister replied, that France had much cause of complaint against us, independently of our treaty with England, but that, by this treaty, ours with them was annihilated. That the directors considered it proper to act, in these respects, as absolutely unfriendly to them, and, under which impression, it was their duty so to represent it to us: that the mode which was proposed of making such representation had been deemed mild and respectful, and as such ought not to give offence. He admitted, however, that the objections I had stated against it were strong and weighty with him, and that he would immediately make them known to the directors, and by whom, he doubted not, all suitable attention would be paid to them. Since this I have not seen him, but propose seeing him again, either to-day or to-morrow, on this subject; and, after which, I will immediately apprise you of the state in which it may be.

This affair has given me great concern, because it opens a new era upon us; and whose consequences, unless the measure itself be prevented, may be of a very serious kind. I shall do every thing in my power to prevent it, and, in any event, communicate to you, and with the utmost dispatch, every incident that turns up connected with it.

So far, my object has been to break the measure in question; and after which, if effected, I shall most probably be called on for explanations of the treaty complained of; and, in which case, I shall of course avail myself, in the best manner possible, of those communications which have been heretofore received from your Department.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Paris, May 5, 1796.

Being informed by you that the executive directory considers the late treaty between the United States of America and Great Britain as derogating, in some respects, from the treaties of alliance and commerce subsisting betwixt the two republics, and that your mission to the United States, will be instructed to represent the same to our Government, I have thought it my duty to ask an audience of the executive directory upon that subject, not doubting that the explanations I shall be able to give thereon will make on that body an impression sufficiently satisfactory to merit all its attention. Permit me, therefore, to request, citizen minister, that you will, at your leisure, communicate to me the explanation which your government have given of the treaty, and which, I am sure, will be the best means of informing the executive directory upon that subject, at such time as may be most convenient for that body to receive me.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

Paris, 17th Ventose, (March 7th, 1796) 4th year of the republic.

I have the honor to inform you, citizen, that the executive directory will receive you to-morrow, the 18th instant, at ten in the morning.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, March 10th, 1796.

I informed you, in my last of the 16th and 20th ultimo, of a communication made by me to the minister of foreign affairs, that the directors had resolved to send an envoy extraordinary to the United States, to remonstrate against our late treaty with England, and of my efforts to prevent it; and I have now the pleasure to add that I have reason to believe those efforts have been successful, the minister having assured me, in a late conference, that the directory was disposed to accommodate in this respect, and to make its representations, on that subject, through the ordinary channel. He repeated, however, upon this occasion, in terms equally strong with those he had used before, that the object was to protect the United States from the injury done to France by that treaty, and upon which explanations were expected, and would be sought.

I asked him what were his objections to the treaty, to which he replied, as before, in general, rather than in particular instances; and that the tendered states with which they were not in alliance in the present war. I replied, that it was not admitted by our Government, that any, the slightest, deviation would give us any reason to doubt of our treaties with this republic; nor ought it to be presumed, until it was shown that such was the case, especially as I had before informed him, and now repeated my willingness to discuss that point, whenever he thought fit. He intimated that I should certainly hear from him on the subject, and in time to receive a reply, and attend to all the observations I chose to make on it, but being now before the directory, he could not well enter on it the manner I proposed, until he had the further orders of that body in that respect. Thus, therefore, the matter now stands, and I have only to repeat to you my assurance that I shall continue to pay to it all the attention it deservedly merits.
The state of affairs here has not varied essentially of late, either in the internal or in the external relations of the republic. The forced loan was less productive than it was expected to be, and of course the relief it gives must be considered as partial, and temporary only. Nor is any system yet adopted to supply what will be necessary, after the amount thus raised is spent. The situation of the Government has, indeed, changed, the money is not required for the prompt execution of any important object; and, for this reason, the measure has been, to a certain extent, suspended until the earnings of the year to come can be applied in carrying it out. The war it is determined to pursue does not require such a voluntary contribution as that it is in contemplation to make. The annual loan of the state is not likely to be required until the next winter, and for three or four years, the exigencies of the republic have not been such as to render the prompt raising of any considerable sum of money necessary.

The Treasury is well supplied for the current year, and the Senate, in investigating the proceedings of the last, has found no proof of any misappropriation of the money collected by it. The state of the finances is such as to authorize the Government to suspend the collection of any further money, and to depend on the receipts to pay all the expenses of the war.

The President, in his message to Congress, has laid before it a statement of the amount required for the support of the army and navy, and of the means by which it is proposed to raise the money necessary to carry it out. The amount required is not large, the receipts are more than sufficient, and the money required is to be collected in the usual way, by the sale of bonds, and the payment of interest on the existing debt.

The President has recommended the appointment of a committee of three to consider the measures for the collection of the money required, and to report to Congress a plan for the prompt and effectual execution of the measure. The committee has been appointed, and is now engaged in the discharge of its duties.

The measures recommended by the President are such as to secure the prompt and effectual collection of the money required, and to place the Government in a condition to carry on the war with success. The President has introduced a measure for the amendment of the Constitution, which will do much to render the Government more efficient, and to secure the rights of the people.

the most striking of a confession, without limits, in abandoning the rule, which the rights of nations, their treaties with all other Powers, and even the treaties of England with most of the maritime Powers, have given to contraband. To sacrifice, exclusively to this Power, the objects which are necessary for the equipment and construction of vessels, is not to depart evidently from the principles of neutrality?

But in order to bring this point into an intelligible form, I suppose it is not necessary to enumerate the denominated of contraband even to provisions. Instead of restricting it, as all treaties have done, to the case of an effective blockade of a port, as forming the only exception to the complete freedom of this article, they have tacitly acknowledged the pretensions of England to extend the blockade to our colonies, and even to France, by the force of a proclamation alone. This shews the extent to which the principle of neutrality is not understood or observed, and is not only seen in the citadels of the United States, by the course by which they have contracted to defend our colonial possessions, and with the duties, not less sacred, which the great and inestimable benefits they derive from their commerce with those islands bind them to observe.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

Mr. Monroe to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

PARIS, March 15th, 1796.

I was lately honored with your note of the 19th Ventose, (March 9th) objecting to several of the measures of our Government, that have occurred in the course of the present war, and to which, I presume, I shall herein render you a satisfactory answer. For this purpose I shall pursue in reply the order you have observed, in stating those objections; and, according to the light I have on the subject, give to each the answer it requires.

The objections are comprised under three distinct heads, a summary of which I will first expose, that my reply to each may be better understood.

First. Your first complaint is, that we have failed to execute our treaties with you, and in the following respects:

1. By submitting to our tribunals the cognizance of prizes brought into our ports by your privateers. 2. By admitting English vessels of war into our ports, against the stipulation of the seventeenth article of our treaty of commerce, even after such vessels had taken prizes from you, and in some cases with their prizes. 3. By omitting to execute the consular convention, which, according to the most important clause of it, required you to provide, as you suggested, suitable means for carrying those clauses into effects the first of which secures to your consuls within the United States, the exclusive jurisdiction of all controversies between French citizens; and the second, the right to pursue, and recover, all mariners who desert from your vessels. 4. By suffering, in the port of Philadelphia, the arrestation of the captain of the corvette Cassius, for an act committed by him on the high sea, and which you say is contrary to the nineteenth article of the treaty of commerce, which stipulates, that "the commandants of public and private vessels shall not be detained in any manner;" and the rights of nations, which put such officers under the protection of their respective flags; and by likewise attempting to invalidate the recognition of that corvette, though armed at Cape Fréres, upon the pretense that she was armed in the United States.

Second. Your second complaint states, that an outrage, which was made to this republic, in the person of the minister, the citizen Pauchet, by an English vessel (the Africa) in concert with an English consul, in arresting, with the jurisdiction of the United States, the vessel in which Mr. Pauchet was marked, searching his trunks, and afterwards remaining within the waters of those States for near a month, to watch the movement of the frigate in which he finally sailed, was left unpunished; since you urge, that the measures which were taken by our Government, in regard to that vessel, and the consul, were not taken in a suitable time to remedy the evil, and were produced by a subsequent outrage, and of a very different kind.

Third. Your third and last complaint applies to our late treaty with England; which you say, not only sacrifices, in favor of that Power, our treaty with France, but departs from that line of impartiality which, as a neutral nation, we were bound to observe. Paragraphs and stipulations are given of this charge in your note, and which I shall particularly notice when I come to reply to it.

This is a summary of your complaints, and to each of which I will now give a precise, and, I flatter myself, a satisfactory answer.

First. Of the inexecution of our treaties with this republic, and of the first example given of it: "The submission to our tribunals of the cognizance of prizes brought into our ports by your privateers."

I am ready to answer this charge, to ask whether you insist, as a general principle, that our tribunals are infallible in the right of taking cognizance of the validity of your prizes, in all cases; or are there exceptions to it? As a general principle, without exception, I think it cannot be insisted on; because examples may be given, under it, of possible cases, which prove it cannot be so construed and executed, without an encroachment upon the inherent and unalienable rights of sovereignty in both nations, which neither intended to make, nor does the treaty warrant any exception to.

Suppose, for instance, a prize was taken within our jurisdiction; not upon the high seas, nor even at the entrance or mouth of those great rivers and bays, which penetrate and fertilize our country; but actually in the interior, and at the wharf of some one of our cities. Is this a case over which our tribunals, or some other branch of our Government, can decide, that the true interest of the treaty impels upon us, and which, upon you in turn, the obligation thus to abandon, as a theatre of warfare, in which you bear no part, the interior police of your country? Can it be done consistently with the dignity or the rights of sovereignty? Or, suppose the privateer which took the prize and led it into port was fitted out within the United States, the act being unauthorized by treaty; could we tolerate this, and refuse the like liberty to the other nation at war, without parting from that line of neutrality we ought to observe? You well know that those rights which are secured by treaties form the only preference in a neutral port, which a neutral nation can give to either of the parties at war; and if these are transcended, that the nation which so acting makes itself a party to the war; and, in consequence, merited to be considered and treated as such. These examples prove that there are some exceptions to the general principles; and perhaps there are others which do not occur to me at present. Are these cases the instances in which our treaty is supposed to be in violation? and, if you pretend they are, I am persuaded you will concur in my opinion, that the complaint is unfounded, and that we do not violate our duty—a duty we were bound to perform, as well from a respect to our rights as a sovereign and free people, as to the integrity of our character; being a neutral party in the present war.

You were so far right that I admit the principle, if a prize was taken upon the high sea by a privateer fitted out within the republic, or its dominions, that, in such case, our courts have no right to take cognizance of its validity. But is any case of this kind alleged? I presume none is or can be shown.

2. Proceeding to this, you execute our treaties with this republic, says that, in contravention with the seventeenth article of the treaty of commerce, we have admitted British vessels in our ports, such as have taken prizes from you, and, in some cases, with their prizes. The article referred to stipulates the right for your vessels of war, and privateers, to enter our ports with their prizes, and inhibits that right to your enemies: it does not stipulate that the vessels of war belonging to your enemies shall not enter, but simply that they shall not enter with their prizes. This latter act, therefore, is, I presume, the subject of your complaint. Here,
FOREIGN RELATIONS.

...it only stipulates, that, in case such vessels enter your or our ports, proper measures shall be taken to compel them to retire as soon as possible. Whether you were rightly informed with respect to the fact is a point upon which I cannot decide, as I know nothing about it. Our coast is extensive, our harbors numerous, and the distress of our people has never ceased to be a cause of anxiety. It may have happened that some of the vessels may have been thought to belong to the Government. Many outrages have been committed upon us by that nation in the course of the present war, and this may likewise be of the catalogue. But I will venture to affirm, that no comeliness was given by our Government to the acts of the Presidents of the United States; and that they are in the opinion of my correspondents without delay. You know we have no fleet, and how difficult it is, without one, to execute a stipulation of this kind, with that promptitude which your agents in our country, ardent in your cause, and faithful to your interest, might expect.

2. In the third article under this head states, that we have omitted to execute the consular convention in two of its important clauses; the first of which secures to the consuls of each, in the ports of the other, the exclusive jurisdiction of controversies between their own citizens; and the second of which gives to the consuls a right to receive such mariners as desert from their respective ships. In the former, the supposed incompetency of the law, provided on our part, to execute the judgments of your consuls within our jurisdiction, I can only say, that as to no particular defect is stated, so no precise answer can be given to the objection. And upon the second, which states that the judges charged by our laws to issue warrants for the apprehension of deserters and of all who may be supposed to have deserted, in their vessels, be found afterwards within the territory of the United States, the presentation of the original registers of the vessels to which they belonged, as the ground whereon to issue these warrants, I have to observe, that, by the clause in question, (the ninth article) the original seems to be required; and that the copies spoken of in another part of the treaty, (the fifth article) obviously apply to other objects, and not to such as I have. I now do me here to add an extract from our law, passed on the 9th of April, 1792, expressly to carry into effect the convention in question, and which applies to both cases.

The district judges of the United States shall, within their respective districts, be the competent judges for the purposes expressed in the ninth article of the said convention; and it shall be incumbent on them to give aid to the consuls and vice-consuls of France, in arresting and securing deserters from the vessels of the French nation, according to the tenor of the said article. And where, by any article of the said convention, the consuls and vice-consuls of France are required to give aid to the district judges of the United States, or to the officers of the United States, in the discharge of their respective duties, the said consuls and vice-consuls shall, within their respective districts, be the competent officers, and shall give their aid, according to the tenor of the stipulations. By this extract you will clearly perceive, that it was not the intention of our Government to frustrate or embarrass the execution of this treaty: on the contrary, it was designed to carry it into effect, according to its true intent and meaning; and that it has done so, so far as could be done by suitable legal provisions.

It may hereafter be deemed a subject worthy of consideration, whether the first of these clauses in that convention has not been the subject of misconception from a false idea of the nature of the public administration independent of that country, cannot well be reconciled with any correct idea of its sovereignty: nor can it exercise its functions without frequent interference with the authorities of the country; and which naturally occasions strife and discontent between the two Governments. These, however, are not the only objections to the measure, though with me they, when transmitted, are the most obvious. The circumstances, it was difficult for those consular tribunals to serve their process, and execute their judgments; a limited jurisdiction to a town or village only admits of it. In the United States, therefore, and in France, where the territory is immense, and the number of citizens of each country in the other considerable, as is now the case, it becomes impossible. Many of these, in each country, do not feel the interest of the other, and it was not for the peace of the two Governments that the consuls and vice-consuls should be bound to compel their attendance before him? How execute the judgment afterwards? For the tribunal of one country to call in the aid of the officers of another, to execute its decrees or judgments, is an institution at least objectionable; but to send those officers round the country, through the range of one hundred leagues, is an imposition in the highest degree.

Permit me, then, to ask, what are the motives; on your or our part, for such an institution? In what respect are you or we interested, that your or our consuls should have the exclusive jurisdiction of controversies between your or our citizens, in each other's country? Why not submit those controversies, in common with all others, to the tribunals of each nation? Some considerations in favor of the institution, it is true, occur; but yet they are light and trifling, when compared with the numerous and strong objections that oppose it. So much, however, by way of conclusion.

...In your fourth and last example, under this head states, that the captain of the corvette Cassius was arrested in Philadelphia, for an act committed on the high sea, contrary, as you suggest, to the nineteenth article of the treaty of commerce, which stipulates, that "The commandants of vessels, public and private, shall not be detained in any manner whatever; and of well known rights of nations, which put the officers of public vessels under the safeguard of the public service." And that the vessel was likewise seized, though armed at the Cape, upon the pretext that she was armed some time before in Philadelphia.

As you have not stated what the act was, with the commission whereof the captain was charged, I can, of course, give no explanation on that head. Satisfied, however, I am, that if the crime was of a nature to authorize our courts to take cognizance of it, he would not have been detained by the Government of the United States having ever been a merchant, since that article, as you perceive, was intended to establish a general principle in the intercourse between the two countries; to give a privilege to the ships of war of each, to enter and retire from the ports of the other; and not to seize, in favor of any particular delinquent, an immunity for crimes; nor, in my opinion, does it authorize a law or punishes, admit of a different construction, of the protection to other nations, and other protection to us. I am, however, to hear that he is released, since it furnishes an additional proof that the whole transaction was a judicial one; regular, according to the course of our law, and mingling nothing in it, in any view, that ought to give offence here.

With respect to the sequestration of the corvette Cassius, upon the pretext that she was to watch the motions of the frigates in which he sailed; and which you say was not released, as it ought to have been, by our Government: since you add, the measures which were taken by it, in regard to that vessel, and the consul, were the effect of another and subsequent outrage.

The punishment which was inflicted by our Government upon the parties who committed that outrage, by revoking the commissions of the council, and ordering that all supplies should be withheld from the vessel; as likewise that she should forthwith depart from the waters of the United States, was, I think you will admit, an adequate one for the offence. Certain it is, that, as we have no fleet, it was the only one in our power to inflect and that this punishment was in no wise unwarrantable. The consequence of the state of the nation, the exigencies of the public service, the act of the President upon that subject, a copy of which I herewith transmit to you; and by which you will perceive, that there was no distinct outrage offered to the United States, upon that occasion, by the parties in question; but that both the one and the other (the attempt made upon the packet boat in which you were embarked, by which you were led to believe the corvette had been captured, and which you were informed by the same captain, to the Governor of the State of Rhode Island, in concert with the British consul there, and which conceived the second) were only several incidents to the same transaction, forming together a single offence; and for which that punishment was inflicted on those parties.

I have a further point to add, that the President was neither inattentive to what was due to your rights upon that occasion, nor to the character of the United States, that he gave orders to our minister at London, to complain formally to that Government of that outrage; and to demand of it such satisfaction upon the part, as the nature of the insult required; and which has, doubtless, either been given, or is still expected.

Third. Your third and last complaint applies to our late treaty with England; and which, you say, has sacrificed your sense of security, and the interests of your neutrality.

1. In support of this charge you observe, that we have not only departed from the principles of the armed neutrality adopted in the course of the last war, but have abandoned, in favor of England, the limits which the rights of our nations and our own treaties with all other Powers, and even England in her treaties with many other Powers, has given England as a neutral.

2. That we have also consented that provisions should be deemed contraband, not when destined to a blockaded port only, as should be the case, but in all cases, by tacitly acknowledging the pretensions of England, to place by pleasure and by proclamation, not only your islands, but even France herself in that dilemma.

Contracts therefore, between the United States, and the other neutral Powers, at the time you mention, and acceded to by all the Powers then at war against England, are extremely dear to us; because they are just in themselves, and in many respects very important to our welfare: we insert them in every treaty we make with those Powers who are willing to adopt them; and our hope is, that they will soon become universal. But even so, all these other Powers being as most formidable, and the maritime Powers being arranged against her, you well know that she never acceded to them. How can she, then, upon the present occasion, when that combination was not only broken, but many of the parties, then parties to it, and against England, were now enlisted on her side, support of her principles? You must be sensible that, under these circumstances, it is impossible for us to obtain from that Power the recognition of these principles; and that, of course, we are not culpable for having failed to accomplish that object.

I regret also, that we did not succeed in obtaining from that Power, a more liberal scale of contraband, than was allowed in the treaty of 1795. It is true, the articles of navigation and commerce of 1795, are not particularly alluded to here, and every where else, it was equally an object of importance to enlarge the freedom of commerce in that respect, by diminishing the list of contraband. Perhaps no nation on the globe is more interested in this object, than we are. But here, too, the same difficulty occurred, that had in the preceding case; and it was in consequence decreed by the convention of 1795, that the list of contraband could not be enlarged; and the list of the law of nations to remain unchanged in any respect. Is it urged, that we have made any article contraband that was not so before, by the known and well established law of nations; which England had not a right to seize by that law, and did not during the war, when they fell in her way? This cannot be urged, because the fact is otherwise; for, although we have not amended the law of nations in that respect, yet certainly we have not changed it for the worse; and which alone could give you just cause of complaint.

With respect to the objection stated to a clause in the 19th article of the treaty with England, which presumes we are thereby prohibited bringing provisions from the United States to France, I have only to add, that no such prohibition is to be found in it, or other stipulation which changes the law of nations in that respect; on the contrary, that article leaves the law of nations where it was before authorizing the seizure in those cases only, where such provisions are contraband by the existing law of nations; and according to our construction of the article, and to calling to a blockaded port; and in which case payment is stipulated; but in no respect is the law of nations changed, or any right given to the British to seize other than they had before; and such, I presume, you will agree, is the true import of that article.

You will observe by the article in question, that when our provisions destined for a blockaded port are seized, though by the law of nations subject to confiscation, they are nevertheless exempted from it, and the owners of such provisions entitled to the payment of their value. Surely this stipulation cannot tend to discourage my countrymen from adventuring with provisions into the ports of this republic; nor in any other respect prevent their enterprising here or contrariwise, it was not probable, that it would produce the opposite effects; since, thereby the only penalty which could deter them, that of confiscation, in the case above mentioned, was completely done away?

Thus, citizen minister, I have answered, according to the views of our Government, and the light I have upon the subject, the objections you have stated against several of its measures adopted in the course of the present war; and I hope to your satisfaction. That any occurrence should take place in the annals of the republics, which gave cause for suspicion, that you doubted, in any degree, our sincere and affectionate attachment to your welfare, is a circumstance that cannot otherwise than give pain to our Government and our people. That these, however, should be the result of new stipulations, or of your complaints, on both sides, is the best evidence of your having, in every event, things that I have not come there to ask from that body such exposition, for the purpose of discussing the subject with it, because I knew it was against rule: that I wished, the directorate would cause the minister of foreign affairs to lay open your complaints to me, receive my answer, and enter into a full discussion of them; and in the interim, that it would suspend giving its attention to those complaints, until after the result of that discussion was before it: that the discussion itself could not otherwise than throw light on the subject, and in the degree, promote the interest of both countries, so far as that might be affected by their decision in the matter; and above all, that it was more proper in them, than it was in me, to demand of a foreign government, and that it should be complied with. Some general observations were then made by that body, upon the subject of its complaints, and to which I made the answers that occurred at the time, dissipating its doubts in one or two cases at once, and particularly, with respect to the countenance it heard was given in the United States to their emigrants, by stating, that we received all France, and even Minister, as friends; that we did not, so could we, discriminate against France; as they were generally, on account of their political principles, because we did not know what their principles were: that we saw in them all, the people of a nation to which we were much attached for services rendered us by it in the day of our difficulties, and treated them accordingly: and with respect to the President, that he had given orders, that certain distinguished emigrants, otherwise in some respect entitled to attention, but known to be obnoxious here, should, on that account, be excluded his public hall, which was open to all other persons. Several of the managers of the directory reciprocated, with great earnestness, professions of friendship assuring me, at the same time, that no step should be taken in the business in question, but upon due deliberation, and after the discussion I had asked should be finished, and my arguments fully weighed; and thus I left them.

I shall transmit to you, as soon as it is closed, the result of the communications which may pass between the ministers here and myself, and I doubt not, the discussion will produce a favorable effect. I shall certainly avail myself of all the lights within my reach, to do justice to a cause of so much importance to my country.

Upon some misunderstanding with the directory, Pichegru has sent in his resignation, and obtained his dismission; an event that must be deemed unfortunate to the republic as such, 736 a most, a man of great talents and integrity. Claris has done the same thing with the Emperor so that the account of folly between the two Governments is fairly balanced.

The finances here continue in derangement, and which is not likely to be remedied by a late act, calling in the assignats. Those have suffered too much in their distrust, and call markets, founded on the national domains, with the right in the holder of that paper to take property for it, where he likes, and where he pleases, at the ancient value. This project resembles a bank whose stock consists of, and whose credit of course depends on, land; and which, as it never succeeded well in the lands of individuals, will, most probably, never succeed well in the lands of the public.

I herewith transmit you extracts of two letters lately received from Mr. Barlow, and which I do with a view of giving you every information that comes to my knowledge upon the interesting topic on which they treat.

---

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, May 9th, 1796.

I informed you in my last, of the 25th of March, that I was surprised by the directory, in an audience I had obtained of that body, that the minister of foreign affairs should state to me such objections as were entertained by this Government, to certain measures of our own, and, in the interim, that no step should be taken, under the existing impression, nor until my reply was received, and fully weighed; and I have now the pleasure to transmit to you the result of the communications which took place between the ministers here on myself on that subject. Claris has done the same thing with the Emperor so that the account of folly between the two Governments is fairly balanced.

The campaign was lately opened on the side of Italy, by a suite of three brilliant victories obtained in the space of a few days, by the French under Bonaparte, over the Austrians, commanded by General Drouet, which, in the latter lost, in slain, about five thousand men, and in prisoners, between eight and ten thousand. The road is now open to Turin, whither it is thought the French are pressing. On the Rhine, however, the armies are still inactive; and some persons conjecture that a negotiation is still depending with the Emperor, and will, doubtless, if such is the case, be essentially aided, on the part of France, by these late victories. The Vendée war was lately greatly checked, to say no more, by the total dispersion of the troops gathered there, in opposition to the Government, and the apprehension and execution of Charette and Stofflet, the two principal chiefs who herebefore headed it; and subsequent confinements of the rebels of my own countrymen were such as to explain at least, that it was at any preceding period, since it began. But such has been the varied fortune of that extraordinary war, and so often has it revived after it was supposed to be totally extinguished, that appearances, however strong, are not to be too much confided in, nor can it well be pronounced at an end, until the Revolution itself is closed.

I send you herewith an extract of a letter from Mr. Barlow, from Algiers, just received, and which will, perhaps, give you the latest intelligence from that quarter.

---

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, May 25th, 1796.

Since my last, of the 32d instant, I have heard nothing from this Government upon the subject communicated to you by the Minister of foreign affairs; and which you, at the request of the President of the Directory, asked him to communicate to me in his own name. I have, however, received, from the other minister, papers, which, with the other documents, I have transmitted to you, and which, as shown by the papers transmitted in my last. Nor have I understood, through any other channel, that any decision is taken on that subject. I flatter myself, therefore, that I shall hear nothing further on it. As yet, however, no successor is appointed to Mr. Adet, according to his own request; and who remains, of course, the locum tenens until one is appointed. I mention this circumstance, because as such an appointment was so long delayed, when that discussion commenced, and was probably delayed by it, so nothing can be satisfactorily inferred, at least for the present, of the final decision of the Directory, upon the topic in discussion, until that of the appointment is likewise resumed in another case.

I was lately favored with yours of the 7th of January, communicating the correspondence which took place between the President and the minister of France, when the latter presented the flag which was voted by the Convention; as likewise the resolutions of both Houses of Congress on the same subject, with the letter of the President to the Directory in consideration of the same, which letter desire you, doubtless, without delay, to communicate to me. Accordingly, the day after I received it I waited on the minister of foreign affairs, and presented the letter to him, with a request that he would deliver it to the directory as soon as possible; and to which communication I have since received the reply, of which I herewith send you a copy.

There was lately announced by the directory to the council of five hundred, the discovery of a conspiracy against the Government; whose avowed object was to overthrow the present constitution, and establish that of 1792 in its stead. The details furnished exhibit a project, which sought to marshal one description of patriots against another; the leaders in the innovating party, divided from the great body of the nation and offering as an allurement to the poor, and in support of their interests, the free pillage of the wealthy. Fortunately, however, the project was discovered in good time, by the directory, and crushed in embryo. What its real object was, who were its real authors, and how many were comprised in it, time will doubtless disclose. Perhaps the truth is that it was a project which five hundred, lately a prisoner in Austria, and who is accused of being a principal in it, will throw light on the subject in both views.

The discovery of this plot excited anew the jealousy of this Government against foreigners, some of whom were suspected of having an agency in it; and which subjected our counymen, as well on the subject of others, to severe trials. The foreign ministers were, in consequence, called on for a list of their countrymen here, with the business of each respectively; which I have given, and by which, I presume, permission to remain will be obtained for all those who are American citizens.

The success of the French troops in Italy, whereby the Austrian and Sardinian armies were completely routed, in several severe conflicts, and with great loss to the Austrians, has already obtained for the republic a very advantageous peace with Sardinia; by which the king has not only abandoned the coalition, but ceded forever to France Savoy and Nice; and even put himself in effect, for the residue of the war, under the protection of the French republic. The papers forwarded will give you the details of this event, as likewise of the provisional treaty which ensued with Parma. It is generally admitted that the road to Rome is opened; and said, that the Pope is so sensible of this, that he has offered to the directory, among other inducements, to use his apostolic authority to appose the discontent in the Vendée, and reconcile the disaffected there to the republic, in case they will spare him, for the present, the honor of a visit. A minister of the directory has been received from Naples, so that it is probably some adjustment will likewise soon be made with that Power. Beaulieu, with the residue of the Austrian army, has retreated beyond Milan, to the heights between the lake De Garda and Mantua, a strong position, and noted as being formerly occupied by Prince Eugene; whether, too, he was pursued by Bonaparte, who now keeps him in check, or rather avoids a contest with him, efforts are making by both Governments, to send to both their armies reinforcements; so that, perhaps, until they arrive, the final fate of those armies will not be settled.

I enclose you some letters just received from Mr. Barlow, at Algiers, and am, &c.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, June 12th, 1796.

I have the pleasure to inform you, that in a late informal conference with one of the members of the directory, I was advised by him, that the directory had done nothing in regard to us, upon the subject communicated to you in several of my preceding letters; and that he presumed they would do nothing upon that subject. I trust, therefore, that their counsels are thus settled upon this interesting topic, and that I shall hear nothing further from them on it. Should they take a different turn, of which at present there is no particular symptom (for the probability of such a course was greatest in the commencement, and whilst the first impressions were at their height) I shall not fail to apprise you of it, and without delay. As yet no successor is appointed to Mr. Adet; nor can I say what the intention of his Government is in that respect. I presume, however, upon the authority of the above communication, that Mr. Adet could not have proceeded to the course of executing the power granted it by the decree, have authorized none to stay of any nation, for whose good conduct their respective ministers have not made themselves personally responsible. I could not discriminate between my countrymen, by admitting some, and rejecting others; but did every thing in my power to obtain an exemption for all. I have copied a letter that subject to the minister of foreign affairs, and to which I have yet received no official or definitive answer.

The truce was lately terminated by the Emperor, in the manner prescribed by the convention which formed it, which stipulated, that it should cease after the expiration of ten days, upon notice given by either party; and immediately afterwards the campaign was opened by the French, and with the same success, at least to a certain degree, as attended their efforts in Italy. In two rencontres between considerable divisions of the army of the Sambre and Meuse and the Austrians, on the right of the Rhine, the former have gained complete victories; taken in the first, (excluding the killed and wounded) about two thousand four hundred prisoners, and in the second, about three thousand, exclusive of the killed and wounded. In Italy, two new victories have been gained, and by which Beaulieu was forced to retreat through the Venetian territory to the Tyrol, leaving the French masters of that country. I send you the papers which give you the details, and am, &c.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Monroe.

This 4th day of October last, you predicted that if Mr. Jay's treaty should be ratified, it would excite great discontent in France. Early in November, you mentioned the arrival of Mr. Fauchet, extremely dissatisfied with the treaty; adding, that he was well received, and would therefore be attended to. On the 6th of December, you acknowledge the receipt of my letter of September 12th, written subsequently to the ratification of the treaty, to repeat and further explain the principles and views of the Government concerning it. Mr. Adet's objections to the treaty, and their refutation, accompanied my letter; and with such means in your hands—means amply sufficient to vindicate the conduct of the United States—not less regret than surprise is excited, that no attempt was made to apply them to the highly important subject for which they were sent. Although you anticipated discontent; although the symptoms of discontent appeared; although these symptoms, unattended to and unalayed, might increase to an inflammation; Mr. Fauchet's arrival, with all his dissatisfaction and prejudices about him, would assuage add to the irritation; yet you were silent and inactive, until, on the 15th of February, you were alarmed by the projected rejection of the directory, accidentally communicated to you by the minister of foreign affairs, of sending to this country an envoy extraordinary, to represent to our Government their decision concerning the treaty with Great Britain; or that they considered the treaty of alliance between us as ceasing to exist, from the moment the treaty was rati-

PARIS, July 24, 1796.

Sir: I herewith transmit you a copy of a third communication which lately passed between the minister of foreign affairs and myself, upon the subject of our late treaty with England, and which seems to have been produced by my reply to his second letter, which sought information whether the House of Representatives had passed laws to carry that treaty into effect. I presume, therefore, from this consideration, as from the further one, that the direc toire now possesses our view of that subject, (which was my object in asking, and theirs in granting the discussion) that it may now be considered as closed.

You will perceive, in this my last reply, to divert this Government from the subject of this complaint, and which it so uniformly and vehemently pressed of late, by presenting before it a list of ours also, for injuries received from this republic in the course of the present war. The attempt, I knew, was a delicate one at the present time, and under present circumstances; but yet I thought it my duty to make it, since such a view was presented to me in the character of a right, and the possible source of this mischief, and the means of redress. But, in the course of that letter, it was not a little necessary to give some signal proof of it, and that it is impossible, even at this moment, to determine in what scale their councils will ultimately settle in regard to us. At one time it was whispered that they meant to bring for ward a claim against us for all their property taken by the British, in our vessels, including what was taken in the flight of their emigrants from St. Domingo; at another, that they meant to suspend, for the present, all payments to our citizens, and until satisfaction upon their several complaints was obtained; and again, that they would suspend the operation of those articles in our treaty of 1778, which the minister intimated to me in his last letter the directoire thought it its duty to modify; but yet none of these things are done, nor have I any particular reason to pre sume they will be done, other than what appears from the general temper of the Government, and of which you are already sufficiently informed. Upon the whole, therefore, I think I may venture to observe, that as this Government flattered itself with the idea of substituting a strong position in virtue of this was obviously mingled itself with its other motives in respect to these, and which is probably diminished by the time that was gained by the discussion, (admitting that that was the only benefit gained by it) the probability is, that no such measure will now be taken.

In general, it may be said that the cause of complaint was suggested to me, but in so indistinct a manner, and upon so pecu uliar a subject, that I do not even yet comprehend what was meant by it. It was observed to me, by a person in a high station, the other day, when in conversation with him on the other points, that in our late treaty with Spain we had likewise forgotten our relations with France. I expressed my astonishment at the intention, and asked him in what respect, since I could not conceive to what he alluded, France having no territory in that quarter, and of course no rights or interests depending there. He replied, (at least so I understood him) that he did not mean to intimate we had committed a breach of engagements, but of friendship only. He then desisted upon the subject, and went to another point of our deliberations. In my opinion, the directoire is perfectly well aware of the goodness of the former, to support her colonies against Britain; but gave no explanation of what he referred to in the suggestion at first made, nor have I been able since to ascertain it. I will, however, endeavor to fathom this business if possible, and will not, as I succeed, immediately to send papers unworthy of the name. The Pope, I hear, has made a provisional agreement with the Turks, by which he is to pay about twenty-one millions, fifteen of which in specie, and the residue in articles for the army to give up one hundred pictures, the rarest pieces of art, three hundred manuscripts, and exclude the English from his posts. The King of Naples, too, has an envoy now on his way here, and, it is said, with authority to close upon terms favorable to France. It is further to be observed, that the French have entered Leghorn, upon the principle that the English held it, or rather made it a place of deposite for all their supplies for Corsica and elsewhere, in that quarter; and had also violated the neutrality of Tuscany against France. In that part, too, much English property is damaged by the French, which they destroy with a wild and wanton madness. The English are greatly compelled to abandon the field, and seek safety by flight into the mountains of the Tyrol, crossed the Venetian territory, and, in consequence whereof, the French pursued them into Verona. Thus it appears, that no part of Italy can now well be said to be held in any respect secure. If they yield, they have lost, either, heavy contributions to its support, except, Naples, at the extremity, and who is now about to contribute, and Genoa, who loan money, I presume, voluntarily.

Upon the Rhine, too, the same success has attended the arms of France. Both her armies in that quarter, that of the Sambre and Meuse, under Jourdan, and that of the Rhine and Moselle, under Moreau, have each had several actions with the Austrians, and vanquished them in almost every instance. At one moment, indeed, and after gaining some important advantages, Jourdan retired; but, after a more potent enemy, and which brought about the loss of the Austrian troops at Wagram, he was again compelled to march, under the necessity of adverting his attention, elated with their apparent superiority, was drawn to that point, Moreau, who had been inactive, and even made a show of detaching a considerable part of his force for Italy (provision being made on the route for that purpose) crossed the Rhine also, at a very difficult passage, where it was expected no such attempt would be made, and attacked and defeated the Austrians in several encounters, killing many, and taking likewise many prisoners. Since this event, which was about three weeks past, these armies have gone forward slowly, but with a continued career of good fortune, acting in concert, though at a considerable distance from each other, and penetrating into the interior of Germany. The last achievement was that of Frankfort, and which was taken by Jourdan, and from which city, it is said, a contribution of thirty-five millions of florins is demanded. Where this bold enterprise will end, and to what extremity the French are disposed to press their fortunes, in case they are not repulsed, it is impossible for me to say. Nothing transpires from this Government upon that point, and of course we have no data whereon to rest a conjecture, other than our own impressions. It is, however, to be observed, that as the Austrian armies retire, they approach each other as do the French in advancing. Perhaps it is the intention of the Austrian cabinet they shall unite, in the hope, as they are now nearer together, and their junction may, in consequence, probably be sooner made than that of the French, they may, thus united, attempt something, and with better success, against the di- visions of their enemies; and it is even probable, that a series of decisive action has yet been fought. But it is still more probable, that peace with Austria, and upon the terms heretofore insisted on by France, will soon close the war between these two Powers.

The effects of the war, however, are more injurious to French interests than was shown before since the commencement of the Revolution. Great harmony prevails between the different executive corps and the exchequer; and a greater spirit of contentment is discerned by those who travel through France, among all ranks of people, than was seen at any time before since the beginning of that era. It is even said that a change is gradually making among those who were heretofore deemed the implacable foes of republican government; many of whom, now that they find they are protected in the rights of person and property, begin to lose much of their hatred to that form. In truth, prior to the establishment of the present constitution, the people of France had little opportunity of judging correctly of the merits of the republican system. They judged of it by what they saw in the Revolution: for Eu- rope exhibited no other example to their view, and estimating its merits by that standard, they saw in it nothing but a series of terrible and convulsive movements, which they dreaded even more than the tyranny that was lately overthrown. When, therefore, this circumstance is considered, and the improvement which the new Government has introduced is properly appreciated, we immediately perceive the cause to which this change of sentiment in that class is to be ascribed.

The misunderstanding which lately subsisted between Russia and Sweden, has been compromised by some conces- sions on the part of the latter, among which, the recall of Baron de Stael was included, and whose place was com- missioned the Swedish Government to Baron Rehnsky, with the grade of charge d'affaires; but the French Government refused to receive him, it is said, because he was presumed to be appointed under the influence of Russia. One of the ministers of Holland (Blauw) and Reybax, from Geneva, were also lately recalled by their respective Governments, upon the demand of the Directory, and apparently much against the wishes of those Governments; each of those gentlemen having since received assurance of the unanimous confidence of his constituents. The motive of the Directory for making this demand, in either case, is unknown; no reason, as I hear, being given for it to either of the Governments to which it was made. Permit me to make known to you the wish of Isaac Cox Barnett, a citizen of the United States, from Elizabeth- town (Jersey) to be appointed consul at Brest. This young man is well recommended to me in point of morality; appears to possess adequate talents, and from what I hear, is industrious; and being in every view strictly an American, and therefore entitled to the confidence of this country, I beg leave to recommend him to your attention. The French Government have lately proposed the points that were then in dispute, and, after being enabled, our complaints against that treaty have acquired since, in our estimation, new force. I will confine myself, therefore, in communicating the abridgment into details, to announce to you that the opinion of the Directory has never varied upon that point. It has seen in this act, concluded in the midst of hostilities, a breach of the friendship which unites the United States and this republic, one of those acts that are the most offensive to the inhabitants of the United States, an abandonment of that principle which subsisted between the two nations upon this point since their treaty of commerce of 1778. The abandonment of the principles, consecrated by this treaty, has struck us with greater force, from the consideration that all the other treaties, between the United States, and the French Republic, as from the further one, that these principles are in a manner acknowledged that they now form the public law of that country. After this, citizen minister, the executive directory thinks itself founded, in regard to the stipulations of the treaty of 1778, which concern the neutrality of the flag, as altered and suspended, in their most essential parts, by this treaty, and which it would fail in its duty if it did not modify a state of things which would never have been con- ceded to, but upon the condition of the most strict reciprocity.

CH. DE LA CROIX.
The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

PAULS, July 14th, 1796.

I have received your favor of 19th Messidor, (7th July) and am sorry to find by it that the answer I gave to yours of 19th Ventose, containing the exposition of your objections to our late treaty with England, was not satisfactory to you. To this latter letter, therefore, I shall also make a reply, and in the hope that it will produce its desirable effect.

I observe that you confine your objections in this letter to a simple article in that treaty, which failed to secure protection in its bottom's to your goods; and which you deem a violation of a tacit agreement which, you say, has subsisted ever since the treaty of 1778 between that nation and France. This article does not appear to me, or how it ever was, or ever can be, consecrated by that treaty. You likewise say, that the directory considers the stipulations of our treaty of 1778, which respect the neutrality of our flag, as altered, and suspended by this act; and that it would think itself wanting in its duty if it did not modify a state of things which would never have been consented to but upon principles of strict neutrality.

You seem aware, and with great reason, that you have no right to complain of that stipulation, unless it violates some existing obligation, either of the law of nations, or of our treaty with you; and in consequence intimate that it has not modified that treaty. How then, you ask, can we be charged with a violation of the law of all civilized nations. I shall endeavor to show that that article has violated neither the one nor the other.

I presume it cannot be controverted that, by the old and established law of nations, when two Powers are at war, either may take the goods of its enemy in a neutral ship. This doctrine is established by the most eminent writers, and admitted in practice by all nations, between whom particular treaties have not stipulated the contrary.

To prove this assertion, in its first part, permit me to refer you to the following authorities, and which are clear and explicit to that effect: and to prove it, in the second part, permit me to ask, if the law of nations was not, why were special treaties entered into by particular nations to stipulate the contrary? Is it presumable that any Powers would form treaties to establish what was already established? Or was it thought, when our treaty of 1778 was formed, that, in this respect, it made no change, or, in other words, stipulated nothing.

But you say that the law of nations has changed, and that the principles of that treaty have become since, in that respect, the general law of all civilized nations. Permit me to ask you by what authority the latter was or ever was so expressed; or how it appears that it is done? I admit that it is changed among those nations who have formed treaties to that effect, and between those who have so formed them but further the doctrine cannot be carried. It cannot be said, for instance, that the assent of a particular number of nations to a rule which ought to operate between themselves only, is a sufficient ground to substitute it for another. As to the opinion of nations, it may not be possible to say that they would have a right to dictate a law to another part. Such a doctrine would substitute force to right, and might be productive, in other cases, and especially in the hands of Governments less friendly to liberty than yours and ours. It is a doctrine, therefore, is of the most pernicious and pernicious doctrine. That Britain opposed the principle that free ships should make free goods in the last war, and has likewise suspended it in the present war, are facts well known to you; as it likewise is, that all your enemies, in the present war, have done the same, including some who are now your friends, and to the great detriment of America. Admitting, then, that the majority of the civilized nations, and the bar of Europe, have, to a rightful cause (as it is admitted the present one) how was it to be done upon the present occasion, when the Powers composing that majority had shifted sides, and were now marshalled in opposition to the principle they had lately adopted.

Thus it appears that the article in question has not violated the law of nations, according to the opinion of eminent writers, and admitted in practice by nations. Nor has it violated our treaties with France, upon which latter point I shall also add a few words:

It is to be remarked that you do not urge a violation of any positive stipulation in our treaty of 1778; on the contrary, you charge only the breach of a tacit agreement, which you intimate to have grown out of that treaty. But of what nature was that agreement, and whence it is inferred? The treaty contains an express stipulation, between America and France, that, when either of the parties are at war with another nation, it will respect the flag of the other party, trading with that other nation; and it stipulates no more in that behalf. And its reciprocity is to be found in a change of circumstances; whereby the party lately at war is now at peace, and enjoying in turn, (the other being at war) the privilege of its flag in trade with the enemy of the other. It does not stipulate that we will unite in imposing that rule on other nations; nor does it stipulate that we will adopt no other rule with any other nation.

Of course we were free to act, in that respect, as we thought fit; and therefore have violated, by never concurring with you in any implied stipulation that we should.

I concur with you, as I did in my last communication, on this subject, that the utmost respect is due to the principle of free ships making free goods; and with you I also unite in the hope that it will now become universal; since it is the basis upon which all freedom and happiness is founded, and which contains within it all the rights of mankind; the tranquillity of nations. The United States have, too, as you observe, inserted it in all their treaties where they could obtain it; and to which I may add, that they will most certainly continue to press it in their future treaties as opportunities occur; and circumstances may favor, till it becomes general. To promote which end, however, it is only necessary, I think, to observe, that an honest concord between the two nations is absolutely necessary; for otherwise it were impossible they should succeed.

You will observe, that, in my reply to your complaints, I have heretofore confined myself strictly to the subject of those complaints; never going beyond them, to expose in return the injuries we have received from this republic, in the course of the present war.

But I might have told you in the outset that, by a decree of the Convention in 1791, the articles of our treaty of commerce were set aside; and, in violation whereof, about fifty of our vessels were brought into your ports; their cargoes taken from the proprietors, and who yet remain unpaid; that, about the same time, and without any cause being assigned, two of your vessels, upwards of eighty others of our vessels were embargoed at Bordeaux, and detained there for more than a year; and to the great injury of the proprietors, who yet remain unpaid; that, for supplies rendered to your islands in the West Indies, which have been accepted in full payment, respectively, by the United States, as for innumerable spoliations that have been made, and which, daily make upon our public revenue. In like manner, you have extorted from us immense sums due to our citizens, as authenticated by the highest suitable public authorities there and here, and for the want of which many of them are ruined. I say I did not bring these things forward, because it would have borne the aspect of a reciprocation, and which I did not wish any part of my conduct to bear in any transaction with the French republic; and because I was disposed to yield every possible accommodation to your present exigencies that my duty would permit; and because I confided and still confide that your Government, paying due regard to those exigencies, was disposed, and would do all the justice in its power to those suffering individuals. Such notifications with which I was acquainted, I did not communicate to you, for I thought it best, that as the communications that were made on the topics, were made to the preceding Government, and are, in consequence, probably unknown to the present one; and since they are interesting facts which you ought to have before you, I thought it my duty to inform you of them. I think there cannot be a better motive why both republics to preserve, for ever indifferent, the good understanding which now so happily subsists between them.

For what has passed the United States have always found an excuse in that unhappy state of things that was attendant on your Revolutions and have looked forward to the period, when a free and happy constitution should be established in your Republic. Such a period you have now arrived at, and France, with the rest of the world, is moistened with joy at the prospect of it; not in a painful review of any unpleasant incidents that have passed, if such there were, but in deeming the means founded in their mutual interest, and to be secured by suitable and permanent arrangements, whereby to increase their harmony, and cement their union; and greatly mortified would they be if this were not the case. But I trust this will be the case; and under which impression, and upon the observation already made, I submit the subject now in discussion between us to the wisdom and candor of the directoire executif.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, August 4, 1796.

Sir: Within a few days past, Mr. Mungour, formerly consul at Charleston, now secretary of embassy in Spain, was appointed with the rank of charge d’affaires, to succeed, with us, Mr. Adet. This event, as well in respect to the gentleman employed, as the grade chosen, gave me great concern; and therefore merited my immediate attention. Accordingly I visited the minister of foreign affairs this morning, and remonstrated earnestly against the mission of Mr. Mungour to the United States; as a person who, having given evidence of our government upon a former occasion, could not be well received by it upon the present one. To the grade, however, I thought it right to protest; for I could make no explicit objections; because I had no reason to conclude that it was chosen with any unfriendly view towards us; and because I presumed that if the measure was broken in one part, it would probably be so in the other. The minister replied, that he did not apprehend any objection; and not being much disposed to believe that, in case any change was accorded in the measure, it would not be with his consent. He observed, however, that if I would write him a short note on the subject, he would lay it before the directoire; and which I promised I would do.

Within a few days past, too, I heard that the directoire had passed an arrêté, authorizing the seizure of neutral vessels destined for England; to take effect when the English likewise seize them. This arrêté was not announced officially; but by the order of a letter from the minister to Barthelemy, the French ambassador at Basle, published in the gazettes, I saw that the report was true. In consequence, I likewise spoke to the minister on this subject; and received from him, in reply to me, the same assurance, that my letter above mentioned, a copy of which I herewith enclose to you.

It is said that the treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, between France and Spain, is in great forwardness, whereby the latter cedes to the former Louisiana, and perhaps the Floridas. I have no authentic information of this; but the source from whence it came is of a nature to merit attention.

I have the pleasure to transmit to you herewith, some communications respecting our affairs at Algiers, by which it appears that Mr. Barlow had the good fortune to succeed with the Dey, in prolonging the term allotted for the payment of the sum due him, concluded by our late treaty for the ransom of our prisoners, and for peace; and, finally, and although the money was not received, that he had obtained the discharge of our prisoners, and who were fortunately arrived safe at Marseilles. Upon this event, therefore, which not only liberates from a long and painful captivity so many of our countrymen, but in all probability secures the peace which was endangered by the delay of the money stipulated to be paid, I beg leave to congratulate you; since it is an event of only importance in respect to the consolation which it yields to humanity, but equally so in regard to the extension and security of our commerce, in a region of the world heretofore unexplored by it, and where it promises to be very productive.

I commit this letter, with other communications, to the care of Doctor Edwards, who will deliver them in person, and to whom I beg to refer you for other details upon this subject of our affairs here, and our wishes in respect to your wishes. I am, &c.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, August 15th, 1796.

Sir: Being highly impressed with the impropriety of Mr. Mungour’s mission to the United States, and, in consequence, grieved to see it, I felt it my duty to state my objections to it in person, to a member of the directoire, with a request that he would communicate the same to the directoire; and have now the pleasure to inform you, upon the authority of that member, that the arrêté appointing him is rescinded.

I lately received an account from England of the capture of one of our vessels upon our coast, on the point of entering one of our harbors. It was a French man-of-war, supposed she had English property on board, as she was cleared out from that country. Although this report was not so well authenticated, nor accompanied with the necessary details, to enable me to act officially upon it, yet as it might be, and probably was, true, I communicated it immediately to the minister of marine, asking whether such orders were given. He appeared astonished at the report, and declared that none such were issued. I conclude, therefore, that this outrage, if really committed by the enemy, was unauthorized one; and for which we shall obtain from the proper parties, in convenient time, a suitable reparation.

The French troops continue to enjoy an uninterrupted career of good fortune, both in the empire and in Italy. In the former, they meet with little opposition; for, as they have a decided superiority there, the Austrians appear in consequence carefully to avoid a general action; and, therefore, retire slowly before them. And in Italy, a series of victories were lately obtained by Bonaparte over Wurmser, which are deemed more brilliant than even those he had before achieved over Beaulieu, Wurmser’s predecessor. To protect the garrison of Mantua, and retrieve the fortune of Austria in Italy, a considerable force was detached from the Rhine, with other troops gathered from other quarters, under Wurmser, and who, passing the Tyrol, descended into Italy, and attacked Bonaparte, and in the commencement with some success. But this reverse of fortune was transitory as it was sudden; for as soon as the latter gathered his antagonist with accumulated forces; and, in the course of a few days, as appears by the official documents, totally demolished his army, killing and taking upwards of twenty thousand men.

It is lately reported that Mr. Hammond is appointed to repair here to treat for peace; but as yet he has not arrived, nor have we other details on that head than are now in the English papers. With, &c.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, August 20th, 1796.

Sir: On the 19th of July I received your letter of the 9th of last May, covering the paper bearing date the 9th of March, and signed by M. De La Croix, the French minister for foreign affairs, in which you mention the complaints of his Government against the Government of the United States, and your answer to those complaints; and on the 1st of July, the latter, together with a translation of the minister’s statement, were transmitted to the President at Mount Vernon.

Antecedent to the receipt of this letter, the President had conceived it necessary to send a new minister to repre- sent the United States at Paris, and had made a tender of the appointment to General Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, of South Carolina, and a letter of the 19th instant from the President, which I received the 19th, covered Mr. Pinckney’s letter of the 27th of July, declaring his acceptance of the office. He may be expected in Philadelphia by the close of the present month; and he will embark for Europe as soon after as shall be practicable. My letter of the 13th of June (of which a duplicate and triplicate have been forwarded) will have manifested to you the unreasonableness and dissatisfaction of the President, and the cause of both will be apparent in the letter itself.

The President, feeling forcibly the obligations of his office to maintain the honor and interests of the United States, in relation to foreign nations, and our connexions with France, in particular, demanding, from various causes, the most constant and pointed attentions, to prevent or remove jealousies and complaints it was impossible to conceal, it was a duty to express his sentiments consequent on the receipt of your letters of February 16th and 20th, and March 10th and 15th. A further consideration of these communications, with other concurrent circumstances, determined the President to make the appointment in question. Mr. Pickering will be the bearer of your letters of recall. To enable him to accomplish the objects of his mission, he will require all the official documents in your possession, including your correspondence with the French Government as well as with your own; and, according to the usual and necessary course of diplomatic agencies, you will be pleased to transfer them to him.

I am, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, August 27th, 1796.

SIR:--

After the accommodation which was shown in the case of Mr. Munro, by abandoning the project of sending him to the United States, I thought that the crisis had passed here, and that nothing was further to be apprehended from the temper which occasioned it. But this I was disappointed; for I now hear that it is decided to recall Mr. Adet, without nominating a successor to him; and that he is to be instructed to declare to our Government, that the customary relations between us are to cease, and on account of our treaty with England; with other things to the same effect.* * * I shall see the minister to-morrow, and endeavor to lead him to this subject, if possible, and, in my event, renew my exertions to prevent the measure, though, indeed, I begin to despair of success, so often do they return with the same disposition to the same subject.

I am told the treaty with Spain is probably concluded; and by which France is to have Louisiana and the Floridas. This might not have been objected to, but it was made the occasion, which is now, undoubtedly, by the fear, that it might ultimately embroil them with us. The acceptance of it now, therefore, shows that that motive has less weight at the present time than it then had.

It is generally believed that an attempt will be made to invade England, great preparations being made along the coast for that purpose, in troops, boats, &c. and it is also believed that the fleet from Cadiz is intended to make a diversion somewhere, for the purpose of drawing the British fleet out of the channel, to favor the project of a descent. This is strongly supported by circumstances, and, is, therefore, more probable.

It is even whispered that an attack on Canada is to be made, and which is to be united with Louisiana and the Floridas to the south, taking in such parts of our western people as are willing to unite. This is your worthy attention, though it be mere report.

I will write you again in a day or two, since this is despatched in haste on account of the importance of the communication which it contains.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, September 8th, 1796.

SIR:--

General Pinckney will be the bearer of this letter. He is to succeed you as the minister plenipotentiary of the United States with the French republic.

I enclose a triplicate of my letter to you of the 23d ultimo, in which the motives to his appointment are suggested. I also enclose your letter of recall, addressed to the directory of the French republic, and a copy thereof for your information, of the manner in which the President wishes you to take leave of that body.

The claims of the American merchants on the French republic are of great extent, and they are waiting the issue of your instructions, in which you are requested to look into this business, in which the serious interests, and, in some cases, nearly the whole fortunes of our citizens are involved. You will have the goodness to communicate to Mr. Pinckney such general information as may facilitate his inquiries concerning it, and hasten a successful conclusion.

I am, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, September 10th, 1796.

I have been just favored with yours of the 12th of June, the only one received from the Department of State since that of the 7th of January last, a note of Mr. Taylor of the 13th of May excepted.

You charge me in this letter with a neglect of duty, in omitting, as you state, to dissipate, by a timely, and suitable application of the lights in my possession, the discontent of this Government on account of our late treaty with England; and you support this charge by a reference to certain passages in my own correspondence, which state, that this discontent broke out in February last, four months after I had received a letter from yourself and Mr. Randolph, upon the subject of that treaty; and whence you infer, and on account of the delay, or interval which took place between the one and the other event, that I was inattentive to ameliorate the disagreeable circumstances, to remove them, and urge the previous and strong symptoms of discontent, which I witnessed and communicated, as an additional proof of my neglect.

Permit me to remark, that this charge is not more unjust and unexpected than the testimony by which you support it is inapplicable and inconclusive. Indeed, it was easy to show, that the circumstances on which you rely, if they prove any thing, prove directly the reverse of what you deduce from them.

If such discontent existed, and the formal declaration of it, or commencement of measures in consequence of it, was not made (and the greater the discontent, and the longer the delay, the stronger the argument) and any influence applicable to me was drawn from that circumstance, I should suppose it would be precisely the opposite one from that which you draw. Where a discontent exists, it is natural and usual for the party feeling it, to endeavor to remove it, or express its sense of it but the pursuit of an opposite conduct, for a longer length of time, and especially a time of revolution, and when a different and more pernicious one was observed to all the other Powers, is no proof, without other documents, of negligence in me.

But why did this discontent not break out before these letters were received? You saw by my communications, as early as December 1794, and which were frequently repeated afterwards, that it existed, was felt upon our affairs here, and was likely to produce the most serious ill consequences, if the cause continued to exist. If these accounts were correct, why did this Government take no steps under its first impressions, and particularly in August 1795, when Pinckney was dwelling, and our vessels destined for the ports of France were seized and carried into England? Was not this a crisis difficult for me to sustain here when the eyes of France were fixed upon me, as the representative of the nation upon whose friendship they had counted; as the man who had just before been the organ of declarations the most friendly? Why leave us afterwards, and until the last stage, to our unbiased deliberations upon that subject, and without an effort to impede their free course? Do difficulties like these, with the result which followed, give cause to suspect that I was idle or negligent at my post? That I was at any time a calm or inconsiderate spectator of events, and which through my inactivity injured my country? Or that I withheld any light which came to my aid, and which might be useful in dissipating it?

I do not wish to be understood as assuming to myself the merit of this delay, because I know, thinking and feeling as I do, that I was never engaged in any strong bias against the person, cause, and interest of my country. This was the true cause of it. But I well know, that I have done every thing in my power, and from the moment of my arrival to the present time, to promote harmony between the two republics, and to prevent this from taking any step which might possibly disturb it, and which I have done, as well from a sincere attachment to both, as from a personal regard to my country. I believe that what they made me Oath, as a condition of my conduct towards them, was the wisest policy which this Government could adopt, and would produce the best effect upon union, which it is. I presume, equally its wish and its interest to preserve, and of course leave to its constituents to judge of the sincerity of this representation, and if Government had of it, that I have incessantly made efforts to preserve that harmony, and been heard in friendly communications, and often in remonstrance upon the topics connected with it, in a manner I could not otherwise have expected.

But you urge that, as I knew this discontent existed, I ought to have encountered and removed it. I do not distinctly comprehend the extent of this position, or what it was your wish, under existing circumstances, I should have done. Till the 15th of February, no complaint was made to me by this Government against that treaty; nor did I know before that period that any would be for, from the moment of its organization till then, the utmost reserve was observed by me to it on that subject. The intimations which I witnessed, were written before the establishment of the present Government, and drawn, of course, from circumstances which preceded it. Of the probable views, therefore, of the present Government in that respect, I spoke only by conjecture. Was it then your wish, that, because I suspected this Government would or was discontented with that treaty, that I should step forward, invite the discussion, and provoke the attack? Would it have been politic or safe for me to do it; and especially upon a subject so delicate, and important as that was? And had I done it, would I not have been justly accused of my rashness and indiscretion? And might not even different motives have been assigned for my conduct? To me it appeared, that always appeared most suitable, as well as most wise, to stand upon the declared and decided answer objections only when they were made; upon a fair and reasonable presumption, till they were made, that none would be, and upon the principle, if none were made, that our object was obtained; and if there were, that then there would be sufficient time to answer them, and in a regular and official manner. By this, however, I do not wish to be understood as meaning, that in communicating on this, or other subjects, when suitable occasions occurred; for the contrary was the case, as already observed.

What the circumstances were, upon which I based my opinion of the probable ill consequences of that treaty, in the beginning of the year was, as they occurred to me, that there was no public communication which was particularly impressive at the time, omitted then, but which I now think proper to add, because it was that upon which I founded the intimation given you, in my letter of the 20th of October, on that head. Calling one day, upon the subject of our Algerine affairs, informally, upon Jean de Bre, who had, in the committee of public safety, the American branch under his care, I found him engaged upon that treaty, with a copy of it before him, and other papers on the same subject. I began with the object of my visit, and from which he soon digressed upon the other, and with great asperity; adding, that he was preparing a letter for me on that subject, to be submitted to the committee. I answered his charges in the manner which appeared to me most suitable, and of which I doubt but that he had not approved, though I think he approved of that between Mr. Adet and Mr. Randolph; and to which he replied that he had not. I then informed him I had that correspondence, which was an interesting one; and requested he would permit me to give him a copy of it; and further, that he would delay his report to the commie of public safety, he had been busied and fully engaged on it, and he was about to communicate it. He was prepared to give me a copy of that correspondence. This incident took place just before the movement of Vendémiaire, by which the execution of the project contemplated was probably prevented. I omitted this before, because I hoped it would never be revised; and because I did not wish to give more pain on this subject, and especially as I soon afterwards found that the treaty was generally that to be avoided. And I now mention it, as was, I think, the strong ground upon which that intimacy was given, as to prove that none of the lights furnished me, in that respect, were withheld.

So much I have thought proper to say in reply to your favor of the 13th of June; and now it remains for me to proceed with detail of the further progress of this business here, since my last; at least so far as I am acquainted with it.

I sought, immediately after my last was written, and obtained, as soon as possibly could obtain it, an informal communication upon the subject of the treaty mentioned last, expressing my doubts about the legal and moral right of the parties, who had to hear them were still dissatisfied with us, and proposed taking some step in consequence thereof; and which I sincerely regretted, because I had concluded the contrary was the case, after the explanation I had given to their several complaints; and because I thought any measure which had an unfriendly aspect towards us, would increase the difficulty of our operations. They were, perhaps, more anxious for the non-achievement of our treaty with England, and thought that the honor of their country would be sullied in their hands, if they did not say so. I endeavored to lead them into conversation upon the points to which they objected; but soon found they were averse to it, and were of opinion that much time had already been bestowed on that subject. One of the members, however, observed, that the abandonment of the principle, that free ships made free goods, in favor of England, was an injury of a very serious kind, and which could not be passed by unnoticed. I told him, that in this nothing was abandoned, since, by the law of nations, such was the case before; and, of course, that this article only delineated what the existing law was, as I had fully proved in my note to the minister of foreign affairs, that we were not bound to impose the new principle upon other nations. He replied, if we could not carry that principle with England, nor protect our flag against her outrages, that was always a reason why France should not complain; that they never asked us to carry anything, but to abandon the principle, and to abandon it at the rate of time, and under the circumstances we did it, in favor of that Power, was quite a different thing. Finding that the pressure at the time might produce ill effect, and would certainly not produce a good one, I proceeded next to the other points, and to hints what I had heard of their intention with respect to Canada and Louisiana; and to which it was replied, that, in regard to Canada, they had no object for themselves; and in regard to Louisiana, none which ought to disquiet us; that they sincerely wished us well, and hoped matters might be amicably adjusted, since they were disposed to meet suitable propositions to that effect with pleasure; adding, in the close, that the minister of foreign affairs was instructed to communicate to me the arrest they had passed; but in a manner to impress me with a belief that it was not intended to arrest our flag, or to transmit any hostile communications upon the subject. Through other channels I have since heard, that this arrest is withheld from me, and will be, until the despatch is gone; and with a view of securing themselves against further interruption from me, in the present state of the negociation.

From what information I can collect of the contents of this arrest from other sources, (for from the above note was collected,) it is to suspend Adet's functions; instructing him to declare the motive of it; and which I, presume, will correspond with what was declared here, leaving him there for the present; but what he is further to do is not suggested. I shall endeavor to obtain the communication promised by the minister of foreign affairs, and which I shall endeavor to procure as soon as possible.

I herewith enclose you a copy of a communication from the minister of foreign affairs, with my reply to it; and by which it appears that a truce is obtained by our agent from the regencies of Tunis and Tripoli, with the aid of France.
As yet I have heard nothing from the minister of foreign affairs respecting the arrêté of the directory, mentioned in my last; and which I understood he was instructed to communicate to me. I therefore conclude that the delay is intentional; and that I shall not hear from him until the despatch is gone; and after which it will be useless. Indeed, the minister seemed to be of a tight at present, and for reasons heretofore communicated, which every day further experience more fully confirms.

But, being extremely anxious to fathom the point, whether this Government intended any thing really hostile to us, beyond what it calls a reprisal for our treaty with England, or indemnity against its consequences; and, in particular, whether it had been the design, on any occasion it is presumed the目录 has been kept, by the Directory, in close correspondence with the people to a junction with them, and thus eventually dismember us, in case they were willing. I lately revived a conversation mentioned in my last, with a member of the directory, leading it more directly to this point, than I thought at first I could obtain from him the answer I desired. He told me explicitly, they had no object with respect to Canada for themselves, but that they were resolved to separate from the plans that they were anxious about Louisiana, and if they took it, it would be only in case of a war between Spain and England, and then the principal motive would be to keep the British from it, who would doubtless endeavor to avail themselves of such an occasion to either extend or dismiss an alliance; and that it was not necessary to consider it as a case in which there would not exist, in the breast of a member of the Government, an intention or wish to disturb it; that they would take no step they did not avow to our Government, and that therefore we need harbour no suspicion of designs from them, beyond what they did avow.

I have likewise obtained information from other, I think authentic, sources, upon this point, and by which I am the more confirmed in the integrity of the above communication. In short, I am satisfied no such project exists at present, either on the part of this Government, or the Western people of the United States; and that what has been whispered on that subject, is either the imagination of slanders originating, perhaps, with those who wish, or the offspring of fancies too much agitated with the danger of the present, or the year 1796, period. The periodic attack for the pernicious tendency which an unfortunate and disastrous negotiation had upon our affairs in that respect, till our late treaty with Spain, we were always, in a greater or less degree menaced with this misfortune; but, by that treaty, the source was removed; and now that double and every part of the Federal empire, there appears to be nothing in the political horizon which clouds the prospect before us, or which ought to inspire a doubt that our Union will not be perpetual. By this, however, I do not inculcate an opinion, that we ought to be over confident of our security upon this or any other point, or inattentive to the measures of preserving it. I should think this to be the case; in the present one, therefore, a greater degree of vigilance is of course the more necessary.

An order was lately issued, as I have reason to believe, to seize British property in neutral vessels; and to bring those vessels into port for that purpose. I did hope, and, indeed, understood at first, that the arrêté of the directory, was provisional, and intended to be applied only to such cases of British seizure, as occurred last year; and such I think was the case at first. But now it is said it is modified as above. I have written to the minister to demand an official information upon this point; and, in the interim, have communicated the fact, as I understand it to be, to Mr. King, to whom the information may be useful.

I send you a copy of the treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, between France and Spain; and which, as you will observe, contains no stipulation respecting Louisiana and the Floridas. Nor have I any reason to conclude that there is anything in that treaty, or any other article on that subject. I rather think, from what I can collect, that it is a point still in negotiation between those Powers, and that any arrangement with regard to it, if an agreement can be arrived at, will be the result of the operations of time; and which whose decision upon it may be essentially influenced by the relation which is to subsist, for the future, between this country and ours. If this relation is established upon the close footing they wish it, then I think it probable (should the Directory, as it has been represented, in its present state, be restricted) that some part will decline accepting it, from the fear it might prove a calamity to ours. This is the subject of jealousy between us, and weaken that connection. But, should the contrary be the result, then I think they will act otherwise, and endeavor, not only in this respect, but by every other practicable means, to strengthen their own resources, and to make themselves as independent of us as possible. Upon this subject, however, I never touched with them, nor do I hazard a conjecture as to other than general circumstances already known to you.

Jourdan was lately compelled to retreat through a considerable tract of country, being defeated, as I presume, (for the details are unknown) in several severe actions, and encounters, and doubtless with great loss. He is at present in the middle of his army in the Liegnitz, where he occupies a strong position. And it is, however, on his route from Holland, at the head of twenty-five thousand men, to join, and, as it is reported, to supersede him; it being a maxim of this Government to remove, and without delay, every unsuccessful general, upon the presumption that the spirit of the troops cannot be well revived under the same person with whom they were defeated. He writes that the French are in good heart and high spirits, after a brilliant victory obtained over Wurmser, in the Tyrol, if possible, than the former one; having actually taken sixteen thousand prisoners, about seventy cannon, with all kind of military stores, and completely broken the army he had lately commanded them.

The march of Beaumontois from Holland argues a secret understanding between the directory and the King of Prussia; and the late treaty between France and Spain, almost the certainty of a war between the latter and England.

An attack was lately made upon a camp near Paris, consisting of six or eight thousand men, by about as many hussars; and in which the latter were repelled, many of them taken prisoners, and who are now under trial by a military commission. Of those upon whom sentence is pronounced, some were condemned to capital punishment, which was immediately executed; others to transportation, and some to confinement in the residuum, which constituted by far the greatest part, were acquitted and discharged. This enterprise was undertaken by a party who wish to overthrow the Government, or rather, who imagine they could not expect to overmarke the (Government) and whose ostensible object was to establish the constitution of 1793. The presumption, too, is, that it had favorers in the camp, or that it would not have made an attempt on the camp; but of this there was no proof that I know. This enterprise was repulsed, and the consequences of the same, by the Directory, by the same active, though invisible agents. To the details of this trial we must look for a more accurate development of the character of this affair, than can be obtained, at present, from any other source.

In general, the people of this country are armed with the war, but yet there are no symptoms of an approaching peace with the Emperor, or with England. The directory, it is said, wishes peace, and upon reasonable terms; but of this I have no information to be relied on. The state of the finances, too, must be bad; indeed, it is inconceivable how three or four hundred thousand men, the minimum, in my judgment, of the French, force on foot, with the expenses of the civil Government, the colonial establishment, and the navy, are sustained; not making mention of the additional expense, of which, however, in addition to which, it may be observed, that the occasional sales of the national domains, and the various taxes which are collected, might likewise form a considerable resource. The conflict of parties also in the two councils is often great. The fact is, that these councils are not only a body of counsellors, but, by the Directory, to which neither had a hand, the execution of its functions was committed to the opposite one. The former party, therefore, was dissatisfied with this event, and looks forward to the approaching elections as a period when it will be possible to have the power it then lost. To this period also the rivalists look forward. The question is, whether it will present an opportunity, favorable to their interests, in the distant six months, and though a circumstance in perspective, worthy of attention in a sound calculation of the probable ultimate issue of the revolution yet, perhaps, too remote, and even too trivial, considering the immediate and urgent pressure of other causes, to have much influence with either of those Powers, and especially the Emperor, in deciding him at present, upon the subject of war or peace.
Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, October 6, 1796.

I enclose you a copy of my letter to the minister of foreign affairs, demanding whether orders are issued for seizing the property of their enemies in our vessels; and to which I have yet received no answer. I am confident, however, those orders are issued, being assured of it through other channels, apparently too direct to admit any doubt of the fact.

I enclose you also copies of three notes from him, and of my replies; the first two of which respect the judicial process sustained in one of our courts against Governor Collot, late of Guadaloupe; and the third, a report said to be circulating here, that the President had laid an embargo on all French vessels in our parts. These communications contain every thing that has passed between this Government and myself, since my last; and, of course, every thing that I can now add to what you have already received.

The army of Sarthe and Meuse has retreated to the Rhine, where it was met by twenty thousand men from Holland, under Bourrunville, to whom the chief command is transferred. The reports of the loss sustained by this army are various; some accounts make it twenty thousand, whilst others reduce it to six, but, in my judgment, the former appears nearer the truth; great part of its artillery must likewise have been lost. The retreat of this army exposed the other, of the Rhine and Moselle, under Moreau, to danger from which it is not yet extricated. It is known that this latter is also on the retreat, and the Archduke is now bending his force towards it. Some accounts say that Bourrunville will be able to co-operate, as to give effectual aid, but which is denied by others. At the present moment, therefore, nothing certain can be given you of the actual state of that army, or of what will probably result from it. In a short time, however, I expect to be able to be more full and explicit on this subject.

It is said that an English minister is at Dieppe, on his way here; and that a Portuguese one is in town, with a view, no doubt, on the part of each, to treat of peace.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, October 21, 1796.

I have lately received, from the minister of foreign affairs, the note I intimated to you, some time since, that had reason to conclude he was instructed to write me a copy of which, with one of my reply, I herewith enclose to you. I likewise send you copies of two other notes from him, and of my replies upon other subjects, and which are only deserving of attention, as they serve to show the actual disposition of this Government towards us at the present moment.

Upon a critical view of the note first above mentioned, it was doubted whether my functions were not likewise suspended with those of Mr. Adet; and I was disposed in consequence to ask an explanation on that head, but from this I was swerved by the following considerations. First, that it is most likely that they probably have been so expressed, and in explicit terms; Secondly, As it was not so expressed, that such a demand might tend to irritate and thereby widen the breach; and thirdly, That the same end might be obtained by the submission of one of my protests to the minister for legalisation, since it would tend to prove, in case he performed that office, that they were not suspended. Accordingly, I took this latter course, and now, so far as any inference was to be drawn from that circumstance, that it was not the intention of the directorate to suspend them.

This subject is now before the President upon the representation of Mr. Adet; and upon which, as I know nothing beyond what you now have, it is impossible for me to make any comment. He will express to you, in such a manner as he thinks most conducive to the honor, the interest, and welfare of our country; and, in the interim, and until I hear from you, I shall endeavor, and without a compromitment of any kind, to conciliate, so far as in my power, the good disposition of this Government towards us.

I send you a narrative, which contains an official account of the arrival of Moreau at Fribourg, after making a safe and honorable retreat through a great extent of country, and to which he was exposed by the defeat of Jourdan. He is now considered as out of danger. The army, too, under Bourrunville is said to be reorganized, and in considerable force, so that it is possible, notwithstanding the late season of the year, something further may be done, and especially if the Archduke, by advancing, courts a new encounter.

Yesterday the English minister arrived; but what the prospect of peace is, there is no datum whereon to hazard a conjecture.

The Minister of External Relations to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

PARIS, 16 Vendémiaire, (Oct. 7th, 1796)

5th year of the republic.

Citizen Minister:

The executive directory charges me to notify to you the suspension of all the functions which it has prescribed to the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic new the United States. It charges me, likewise, to communicate to you the arrest of, of which I have the honor to send you a copy, and agreeably to which our ships, armed for war, will treat the United States, as these suffer the English to treat them.

The first step, citizen minister, does not need to be commented on. My despatches of the 19th Ventose, and 19th Maissonier last, and more especially the events which have, for some time past, followed each other in the United States, sufficiently explain its motives.

Citizen Adet will enter with the Federal Government upon further explanations, which, I dare hope, will fully justify to it the measure of the executive directory. It is painful for the French government to see itself forced acts upon acts, to break a coldness between two nations, whom so many circumstances engage to unite themselves more and more closely. But, citizen minister, you know too well from what side the first blow was given to that friendship, which our two nations had sworn to. It is very consoling for the executive directory, on reviewing its conduct, and that of the Government which preceded it, to find that the French republic is blameless in this respect. At present, its dignity would evidently be brought into question, it would neglect its duty, if it did not give unequivocal proofs of a just dissatisfaction.

The ordinary relations subsisting between the two people, in virtue of the conventions and treaties, shall not, on this account, be suspended. The commerce will remain charged to superintend them. The eventual modification, which shall be produced, in that state of things, by the arrest of, the directory, I communicate to you, can, in no manner, be considered as alterations made by us. These would generally be commanded by the circumstances, and by the violation of the most general laws of neutrality, which the English take the liberty to commit, if they were not, at the same time, the violation of the treaty between the two republics, and the necessary consequence of the treaty since concluded between the United States and England. The Federal Government is too enlightened not to have foreseen all the results of that treaty, and, no doubt, too just to desire that its whole weight should fall on the French republic.

It shall not be the fault of the executive directory, citizen minister, if the political relations between the two nations are not speedily re-established on the footing they ought to be; and if the clouds, which cast a gloom on our alliance be not dispelled by frank and loyal explanations, to which it will be anxious to listen; above all, citizen minister, when they shall be made through you.

Health and fraternity.

CH. DE LA CROIX.
The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

PARIS, October 19th, 1796.

I have just been favored with yours of the 7th instant, (16th Vendémiaire) announcing that the directoire exécutif had suspended Mr. Adet's functions as minister plenipotentiary to the United States and had likewise given orders that the armed ships of the republic should treat our vessels in the same manner as the English treat them; and that both measures were taken in consequence of certain acts of our Government, which have occurred in the course of the present war; and particularly our late treaty with Great Britain.

I have received this communication with red concern, because I had presumed that the explanation I had given in my replies to your several complaints, stated in the two notes to which you refer, was satisfactory; and because I cannot otherwise than lament that any incident should occur, and especially during my service here, which betrayed a diminution on either side of that harmony and friendship which ought always to subsist between our Governments. I flatter myself, however, that this discontent will prove transitory, and that I shall soon have the pleasure to witness the complete restoration of that sincere and cordial amity which has heretofore so happily subsisted between the two republics.

I forbear to add any thing, at present, upon the subject of your complaints, because, in the state in which that business now is, it could not otherwise than be unprofitable, and because it would ill accord with the respect I owe to my own Government, before whom that subject now is, for me to address you further on it, at the present moment. I shall await, therefore, with patience, as it is my duty to do, the orders of the President in this respect, to whom it belongs to direct the course it may be deemed suitable for the to take in the present conjuncture.

Be assured, sir, that, as there is no political object which I have more sincerely at heart than a continuance of perfect harmony between our two republics, so no political incidents can occur, to give me so much pleasure, as those in which I become the organ of such communications as have a tendency to promote it.

I cannot close my reply, citizen minister, without making to yourself, and the directoire exécutif, my sincere acknowledgment for the attention with which you have heard my several communications, formal and informal, on this subject; and in which I have endeavored, with the best views towards the interest and welfare of both countries, to divert you from any measure of this kind, and I beg to assure you that the liberal sentiments you have been pleased to express in my favor will always prove a source of the most grateful remembrance.

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Monroe, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

PARIS, 19th Frimaire, (Dec. 2d, 1796) 5th year of the republic.

Citizen Minister:

As the arrival of Mr. Pinckney at Paris seems to be near at hand, if it has not already taken place, I thought it incumbent on me to inform you of the formalities which you will have to observe on that occasion. It is customary that the recalled minister and his successor transmit to the minister of external relations the copy of their credentials and letters of recall. Presuming that your letters of recall have already been received by you, I invite you to communicate them to me as soon as possible.

Health and fraternity.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

PARIS, December 3, 1796.

I have been honored with your favor of yesterday, prescribing the mode to be pursued upon the arrival of Mr. Pinckney, who succeeds me in the office of minister plenipotentiary, with the French republic, by forwarding to you his letters of credential with mine of recall, and which I will most willingly comply with as soon as he arrives. He may be daily expected; perhaps he is already arrived, of which I will inform you as soon as advised of it. I have not yet received my letter of recall, or would now send you a copy of it: I expect it by Mr. Pinckney, being so advised by our Secretary of State, who then announced to me only the fact that I was recalled.

Accept the assurance, &c.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

PARIS, December 6, 1796.

I have the honor to inform you that my successor (Mr. Pinckney) is arrived, and is desirous of waiting on you for the purpose of presenting a copy of his letter of credential for the directoire exécutif of the French republic. By him I have also received my letter of recall. Permit me, therefore, to request you will be so obliging as to appoint a time when Mr. Pinckney and myself shall have the honor to attend you, for the purpose of presenting you copies of these documents.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

PARIS, 10th Frimaire, (December 9, 1796) 5th year of the republic.

Citizen Minister:

I have received the letter you did me the honor to write to me, in which you demand an interview for the citizen Pinckney, appointed your successor, in order to deliver me a copy of his credentials and of your letter of recall. I shall be glad to receive you this very day, from one o'clock in the afternoon to four, if you can find it convenient. I request you to propose to citizen Pinckney.

Health and fraternity.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

Citizen Minister:

I hastened to lay before the executive directory the copy of your letter of recall and of the credentials of Mr. Pinckney, whom the President of the United States has appointed to succeed you as minister plenipotentiary of the said States near the French republic. The directory has charged me to notify to you "that it will no longer recognize nor receive a minister plenipotentiary from the United States, until after a separation of the grievances demanded of the American Government, and which the French republic has a right to expect."
FRANCE.

I beg you, citizen minister, to be persuaded that this determination, which is become necessary, does not oppose the continuance of the affection between the French republic and the American people, which is grounded on former good offices and reciprocal interests; an affection which you have taken pleasure in cultivating by all the means in your power.

Accept, citizen minister, the assurance of my perfect consideration.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

James Monroe, citizen of the United States, to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

As my functions as minister plenipotentiary with the French republic have ceased by the letter of recall which I had the honor to present you some time since, and as it is my wish, in obedience to the order of my Government, to take my leave of the directoire executif without delay, permit me, citizen minister, again to request that you will be so obliging as present this subject before that body, and obtain from it an early appointment for that purpose as may suit its convenience.

Accept the assurance, &c.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Monroe.

Paris, 7th Nov., (Dec. 27, 1796) 5th year of the republic.

I have the honor of informing you, citizen, that the directory will give, next Decade, (December 30) a private audience, for the delivery of your letters of recall. I invite you to come, between 11 and half past 11 o'clock, to the house of external relations. We will proceed together to the directory, to whom I shall have the honor to present you.

Accept, citizen, the expression of the high consideration and of the sincere attachment which are due to your civic virtues.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

Address of Mr. Monroe to the Directory on presenting his letter of recall.

I have the honor to present you with my letter of recall from the President of the United States of America, which closes my political functions with the French republic; and I have likewise the honor to add, that I am instructed by the President to avail myself of this occasion to renew to you, on his part, an assurance of the solicitude which the United States feel for the happiness of the French republic.

In performing this act, many other considerations crowd themselves upon my mind. I was a witness to a Revolution in my own country. I was deeply penetrated with its principles, which are the same with those of your Revolution. I saw, too, its difficulties; and remembering these, and the important services rendered us by France upon that occasion, I have partaken with you in all the perils and trying situations in which you have been placed. It was my fortune to arrive among you in a moment of complicated danger from within and from without; and it is with the most heartfelt satisfaction that, in taking my leave, I behold victory and the dawn of prosperity upon the point of realizing, under the auspices of a wise and excellent constitution, all the great objects for which, in council and the field, you have so long and so nobly contended. The information which I shall carry to America of this state of your affairs will be received by my countrymen with the same joy and solicitude for its continuance, that I now feel and declare for myself.

There is no object which I have always had more uniformly and sincerely at heart, than the continuance of a close union and perfect harmony between our two nations. I accepted my mission with a view to use my utmost efforts to increase and promote this object, and I now derive consolation in a review of my conduct, from the knowledge that I have never deviated from it. Permit me, therefore, in withdrawing, to express an earnest wish that this harmony may be perpetual.

I beg leave to make to you, citizen directors, my particular acknowledgments for the confidence and attention with which you have honored my mission during its continuance, and at the same to assure you that, as I shall always take a deep and sincere interest in whatever concerns the prosperity and welfare of the French republic, so I shall never cease, in my retirement, to pay you, in return for the attention you have shown me, the only acceptable recompense to generous minds, the tribute of a grateful remembrance.

Answer of the President of the Directory.

Mr. Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America:

By presenting this day to the executive directory your letters of recall, you offer a very strange spectacle to Europe. France, rich in her freedom, surrounded by the train of her victories, and strong in the esteem of her allies, will not stoop to calculate the consequences of the condescension of the American Government to the wishes of its ancient tyrants. The French republic expects, however, that the successors of Columbus, Raleigh, and Penn, always proud of their liberty, will never forget that they owe it to France. They will weigh in their wisdom the magnanimous friendship of the French people, with the crafty caresses of perfidious men, who meditate to bring them again under their former yoke. Assurance the good people of America, Mr. minister, that, like them, we adore liberty; that they will always possess our esteem, and find in the French people that republican generosity which knows how to grant peace, as well as to cause its sovereignty to be respected.

As for you, Mr. minister plenipotentiary, you have consultated for principles; you have known the true interests of your country—depart with our regret. We restore, in you, a representative to America; and we preserve the remembrance of the citizen whose personal qualities did honor to that title.
The Secretary of State, in pursuance of an order of the Senate of the eleventh of May, 1796, on the memorial and petition of sundry citizens of the United States, residing in the city of Philadelphia, relative to the losses they had sustained by the capture of their property by French armed vessels on the high seas, or in consequence of the forced or voluntary sales of their provisions and merchandise, to the officers of the colonial administration of the French republic, having examined the case, together with accounts of similar losses sustained by American citizens from the French, in the European seas, or in the ports of France, which, in the details, were necessary connected with the former, respectfully reports:

That, since the commencement of the present war, various and continual complaints have been made by citizens of the United States to the Department of State, and to the ministers of the United States in France, of injuries done to their commerce under the authority of the French republic, and by its agents. These injuries were of two principal descriptions, and were brought forward on behalf of American citizens of the United States: 1st. Losses by forced or voluntary sales of their vessels at sea, from violation of the treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States and France, of the 20th of May, 1794, and 2d. A distressing and long continued embargo laid upon their vessels at Bordeaux, in the years 1793 and 1794.

3d. The non-payment of bills, and other evidences of debts due, drawn by the colonial administrations in the West Indies.

4th. The seizure or forced sales of the cargoes of their vessels, and the appropriating of them to public use, without paying for them, or paying inadequately, or delaying payment for a great length of time.

5th. The non-performance of contracts made by the agents of the Government for supplies.

6th. The condemnation of their vessels and cargoes under the orders of the marine ordinances of France, as incompatible with the treaties subsisting between the two countries. And

7th. The captures sanctioned by a decree of the National Convention of the 9th of May, 1793, (hereto annexed, and marked A.) which, in violation of the treaty of amity and commerce, declared enemy's goods on board of their vessels lawful prize, and directed the French ships of war and privateers, (by order of the Government,) to seize neutral vessels laden with provisions and bound to an enemy's port. It may be proper to remark here, that this decree of the Convention, directing the capture of neutral vessels laden with provisions and destined for enemy ports, preceded, by one month, the order of the British Government for capturing "all vessels loaded with corn, flour, or meal, bound to any port in France, or any port occupied by the armies of France."

Such was the general nature of the claims of the citizens of the United States upon the French republic, previous to the departure of Mr. Monroe, as minister plenipotentiary to France, in the summer of 1794, and since his residence in Paris, the introductions into the departments which had been made of these claims, have greatly increased, and he was instructed to press the French Government to ascertain and pay what might be found justly due. From time to time, as additional cases rose, they were transmitted to him, with the like view. In September of that year, he assigned to his secretary, Mr. Skipwith, (with the provisional appointment of counsel for Paris) the charge of stating the cases, and placing them in the proper train of settlement, reserving to himself the duty of fixing general principles with the Government, and of patronizing and superintending his proceedings.

In conformity with the direction of the minister, Mr. Skipwith, shortly afterwards, made a general report on the injuries, and difficulties and vexations to which the commerce of the United States was subjected by the regulations and restrictions of the French Government, or by the orders and proclamations of the minister to which he added a number of particular cases. A copy of the whole, marked B, is hereto annexed. This report was laid before the French Government; and, added to the various representations of Mr. Monroe, and his predecessor, it produced a decree of the joint committees of public safety, finance, commerce, and supplies, dated the 15th November, 1794, a copy of which, marked C, is annexed. This decree, apparently calculated to remedy many of the evils complained of, afforded but a partial, very partial, in respect to compensations a comparatively small, relief, while it continued in force the principle of the decree of the 9th of May, 1793, which rendered liable to seizure and confiscation the goods of enemy's subjects, even in neutral vessels. A very considerable remission had been accorded exempt from that part of the decree of the 9th of May, which authorised the seizing of vessels going to an enemy's port with provisions, by the decree of the National Convention of the 27th of July, 1793.

On the appearance of the decree of the 9th of May, the American minister at Paris remonstrated against it, as a violator of the treaties of commerce and amity with the United States. In consequence hereof, the Convention by a decree of the 29th of the same month, declare, "That the vessels of the United States are not comprised in the regulations of the decree of the 9th of May." M. le Brun, the minister for foreign affairs, on the 9th of May, communicated this second decree to me, at one of our late interviews, from which we find a new confirmation of the principles from which the French people will never depart, with regard to their good friends and allies, the United States of America." Yet, two days only had elapsed before those principles were departed from: on the 28th of May, the Convention repealed their decree of the 33d. The owners of a French privateer that had captured a very rich American ship, (the reviewing and. court of inquiry having declared her to be an armed vessel,) it was ordered that the vessel be seized and reduced to the prize. They were even the apparent hardness to say, beforehand, that the decree of the 33d would be repealed.

The American minister again complained. So, on the first of July, the Convention passed a fourth decree, again declaring "That the vessels of the United States are not comprised in the regulations of the decree of the 9th of May, conformably to the sixteenth [it should be the twenty-third] article of the treaty concluded the 6th of February, 1778." The new minister for foreign affairs, M. Desforges, accompanied this new decree of July 1st, with the following expression: "I am very happy in being able to give you this new proof of the fraternal sentiments of the French people for their allies, and of their determination to maintain to the utmost of their power, the treaties subsisting between the two Republics." Yet this decree proved as unstable as the former—on the 27th of July it was repealed.

The next decree on this subject was, that of the joint committees, of the 15th of November, 1794, already mentioned. Then followed the decree of the committee of public safety, of the 4th of January, 1795, (14th Nivose, 3d year) repealing the 9th article in the decree of the 15th of November preceding, and, in effect, the articles in the original decree of the 9th of May, 1793, by which the treaty with the United States had been infringed. It is not necessary at this time to give this decree (marked D.) as being the executive order of the 2d of July, 1796, under color of which are committed the shocking depredations on the commerce of the United States which are daily exhibited in the newspapers. The agents of the executive directory, at Marseilles, (Le Brune and Dechamps) have placed in the hands of the minister to the United States (marked C. C.) for capturing all American vessels bound to or from British ports. The Secretary pretends this is not an arbitrary, unauthorized act of their own, but that it is conformable to the intentions of the executive directory, the privates of the French republic in Europe having captured some American vessels, and it is a very evident want of a spirit of conciliation to order the execution of such a determination to condemn American vessels on that ground, pleading the decree of the directory for his authority.

The Secretary has already intimated that the decree of the 15th of November, 1794, was not followed by the expected effect; and that no vessel was taken from it. By the instructions which had been given (the last communication from the Secretary's request for information) it appears that the chiefs for detention of one hundred and three American vessels, by the embargo, at Bordeaux, remained undetermined, no funds having been appropriated by the legislature for payment of them, and that none of the bills drawn by the colonial administrations in the West Indies had been paid to him, the treasury having tendered payment in assignats at their nominal value, and, afterwards, in another species of paper called mandates, which had suffered a great depreciation by circulation; both of which modes of payment were refused to be accepted.

The progress made by Mr. Skipwith in the adjustment of other claims, so far as known to the Secretary, will appear in the annexed printed statement, marked D, copies of which were transmitted, ten months ago, to the officers of the principal collectors of the customs, from the Department of State, for the information of our merchant citizens.

That nothing might be left undone which could be accomplished by the Executive, the attention of General Pinckney, the present minister of the United States to France, was particularly directed to the subject of these claims; but the interval which has elapsed since his departure has not admitted of any interesting communication from him, on this business.

In connexion with other spoliations by French armed vessels, the Secretary intended to mention those committed under a decree dated the 1st of August, 1796, issued by Victor Hugues and Lebas, the special agents of the Executive directory, to the Windward Islands, declaring all vessels loaded with contraband articles of any kind, liable to seizure and confiscation, with their entire cargoes; without making any discrimination in favor of those which might be bound to neutral, or even to French ports. This decree has been enforced against the American trade, without any regard to the established forms of legal proceedings, as will appear from the annexed deposition, marked E, of Joseph Hempstead, master of the brigantine Patty of Westfield. A copy of the decree, marked F, is also annexed.

The Secretary has received a printed copy of another decree, of the same special agents to the Windward Islands, dated 1797, that all vessels, and those laden with any articles, whatever may have been their origin, shall be seiz'd and manifested as privateers: a copy of this last decree will be added to this report, as soon as it shall be translated.

All which is respectfully submitted.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 27, 1797.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

A. Copy of a decree of the national Convention, of the 9th of May, 1793, 3d year of the French republic.

The National Convention, after having heard the report of its committee of marine; considering that the flag of neutral Powers is not respected by the enemies of France; that two cargoes of flour having arrived at Falmouth, in Anglesey, were seized, and been brought before the war, for the service of the French marine, have been detained in England by the Government, which would not pay for it but at a price below what it had been sold for; that a vessel of Papembourg, called the Therissa, commanded by Captain Hendrick Kob, loaded with various effects belonging to Frenchmen, was carried into British ports 2d of last March, by an English cutter; that, under such circumstances, the French nation carried into the same port of Dover, on the 18th of the same month, the Danish ship Mercury Christianland, Captain Treuchen, which had sailed from Dunkirk on the 17th, with a cargo of wheat, for Bordeaux;

That on 23d of March, Captain Shkeley, loaded with about six thousand quintals of American wheat, in going from Falmouth to Saint Malo, was stopped by a frigate, and carried to Guernsey, where the agents of Government have simply promised to pay the value of the cargo although it was not on French account:

That one hundred and one French passengers, of different professions, embarked at Cadiz, by order of the Spanish minister, on board the Genese ship Providence, Captain Ambrose Briance, to be carried to Bayonne, were shamefully pillaged by the crew of an English privateer:

That various reports, which are successively made by the seaports towns of the republic, announce that the same acts of inhumanity and injustice are made, and continued without interruption every day along the whole seacoast:

That, under such circumstances, all the laws of nations being violated, it is not permissible that the French people should feel towards all the neutral Powers, in general, the way they have so repeatedly manifested, and constantly make for the full and entire liberty of commerce and navigation, decrees as follows:

ART. I. The French ships of war and privateers may stop, and bring into the ports of the republic, such neutral vessels as are loaded in whole or in part, either with provisions, belonging to neutrals, and destined for enemy ports, or which bear merchandise belonging to enemy agents.

II. Merchandise belonging to enemies shall be declared good prize, and confiscate for the benefit of the captors; the provisions, belonging to neutrals and loaded for enemy ports, shall be paid for according to their value in the place for which they were destined.

III. In all cases, neutral vessels shall be released when the unloading of the provisions which are stopped, or the merchandise belonging to enemies, shall have been done; the freight for them shall be paid at the rate stipulated by the persons who shipped them. A just indemnity shall be made, in proportion to their detention, by the tribunals who have cognizance of the validity of the prizes.

IV. Those tribunals shall be bound also to transmit, three days after their sentence, a duplicate of the inventory of the said provisions or merchandise to the minister of marine, and another duplicate to the minister for foreign affairs.

V. The present law, applicable to all the prizes which have been made since the declaration of war, shall cease to have effect after the enemy Powers shall declare free, and not liable to seizure, although destined for the ports of the republic, provisions which may be neutral property, and merchandise loaded in neutral ships, which belongs to the French Government, or to French citizens.

B. To James Monroe, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, at Paris.

PARIS, Vendémiaire, 3d year, (October, 1794.)

SIR: At your request I now lay before you a statement of the innumerable embarrassments and difficulties which our commerce has, for a long time, and still continues to labor under, in the different parts of the French republic. It is evident, if their Government does not soon remedy the incessant abuses and vexations practiced daily upon our merchants, vessels, captains, and crews, the trade of the United States with France must cease. I cannot give you an ample view of all the inconveniences and oppressions which have been thrown upon our commerce; many of the consuls and their agents to whom you have written to forward such documents to my office, having not yet done its besides, it would take volumes to expose them at full length.

From the communication, however, already received from the different ports, and from the information I have collected from the captains present, I can assure you that there are near three hundred sail of American vessels now in the ports of France; all of whom have suffered, or are suffering, more or less delay and difficulties, of which the causes are explained in what follows; and you will perceive, I truly believe, that out of which there grows incalculable evils, may be developed under four general heads.

[1797.]

1st. The capture indiscriminately of our vessels, at sea, by the vessels of war of the republic.

2d. The impossibility of Americans selling their cargoes, and receiving payment at the ports to which they are conducted, or of their own accord arrive.

3d. The difficulties and procrastination which they find in their transactions with the boards of marine and commerce.

4th. The non-compliance, or heretofore delay, in fulfilling the contracts, made by the agents of the French republic in America, for supplies of provisions.

The seizure of our vessels at sea often gives rise to the most serious and well founded complaints. The stripping them of their officers and crews, who are generally replaced by boys and inexperienced hands, in order to be conducted to ports, exposes them to much injury, and sometimes total loss; the confinement of our sailors taken out of the vessels, the sale of whose cargoes, and, above all, the serious apprehension of the commission of murder, in Paris, involves the most unwarrantable hardships and delays, and, I am sorry to add, that all our vessels experience some of these difficulties; and, indeed, such as arrive with cargoes on account of the republic, months elapsing before the captains can get their clearances and papers, may perforce lose or suffer huge indemnities, as well as the most serious and delicate transactions of commerce at the different ports, having no power to treat directly for cargoes, it follows, that they must write to the commission at Paris for orders; and, after one or two months' fruitless correspondence, it often happens that the captains are obliged to come up to Paris, where, being ignorant of forms and language, they are forced to encounter new difficulties.

It would be too tedious to mention all the inconveniences resulting from the third general complaint. In the first place, the delays at the commission of marine are incredible. The captains, whose vessels are brought into ports by the armed vessels of the republic, cannot withdraw their papers from the hands of the marine agents, but are forced to Paris, to solicit, time after time, of the marine, a report upon them to the committee of public safety. The cruel delays attending this will be illustrated in the examples annexed. The report being made before it can reach the latter body, it must have the signature of the commissaries, and go through other formalities, and when it is received, the committee is at the same time so tired of the business, they do not find time to do it. Judge, sir, of the delays attending this; indeed, you will see cases where the poor captains have been many months in arriving at the above point; and I, myself, after having pressed several reclamations for weeks past, have not yet been able to bring one to that issue.

To sell to the commission of commerce, is still more difficult. When a bargain is concluded with them, an order is issued to the keepers of the public magazines to receive the cargo sold; who often pretend that there is no room to receive it, and frequently they keep the captains waiting weeks before their whim or convenience will induce them to receive it; this point gained, application must then be made at Paris, to the commission of commerce, for papers, who refer the captain to his board of agents; they make a report to the commissaries of the same commission, from thence it must go to the committee of finance, then to the committee of public safety, from whence it returns to the comptability. This labyrinth of perplexity, of course, throws the captain into the hands of an agent, who prey upon his distress; and when he has made forms and arrangements, he cannot easily touch his money. If, in the first instance, the commission will not purchase his cargo on the terms he asks, they tell him he may depart; but, on returning to his vessel, is most commonly prevented from sailing by the agents at the port. If it is mutually agreed that merchandise shall be taken in exchange, the difficulties become greater.

If the commission agree to take the cargo, and the captain sends the goods, the resolutions of the board of agents will put those very articles in requisition. If the commission tells the captain that they do not want his cargo, and that he may sell to individuals, he finds that he cannot export the proceeds unless he gives a security that he will import afterwards into the republic the same amount in articles of the first necessity, such as provisions, &c. If the captain is so unfortunate as to have been forced to treat with the agents of the commission, he is certain to feel their impolicy, they frequently refuse to confirm their own agreements. In short, after every sort of delay and vexation, the captain claims an indemnity, he has to wade through double the difficulties hereafter stated, and, perhaps, after all, to leave his business incomplete, in the hands of an agent.

The fourth and last general complaint is of a delicate and important import. Mr. Fauchet, the French minister, has made considerable purchases of provisions in America for account and in the name of the French republic; one house has engaged to furnish twenty thousand barrels of flour; thirteen vessels loaded with these provisions have already arrived. It is a great mystery how have I known of the commission of marine purchased those three cargoes; except that in the commencement, they assured me the committee of finance had ordered the payment of three cargoes at Bordeaux; but to my surprise, two days after, I found that no report had been made by the commission of that committee.

You will perceive, sir, the commerce of this country being immediately under the control of one branch of the administration of its Government, that it was necessary to adopt some corresponding measures in order to protect the rights and interests of our citizens, and, for that purpose, having provisionally named me to the place of consul, I have accepted it, as well to answer your views, as in the hope of rendering some good to both republics.

Before I conclude, permit me to observe that it is of indispensable importance to obtain some mode of having the claims of our citizens adjusted, for supplies furnished to the colonies of the French republic, and, likewise, the numerous claims in consequence of the late embargo at Bordeaux. I am authorized by many of the claimants to adjust those claims, and have many of the documents in hand, but wish for further instructions from you.

I would offer to your view a statement of the immense sums already paid by this republic, and to be paid, as indemnities for the extraordinary and useless delays of our vessels; but the consuls and agents have not yet furnished me with the requisite documents; it is, however, a fact, that not a single vessel arrives from America to discharge some such general view to the lady. I am persuaded that millions are absorbed in this manner.

It is with real regret, sir, that I find myself obliged, the duties of my station requiring it, to present to your view so serious a subject, as, in my opinion, makes for the earliest attention; but, if you will not forget, it will ever be my effort to cultivate, as much as possible, a good understanding between the citizens of our country and those of France.

With respect, &c.

The Hon. Col. Monroe.

FULWAR SKIPWITH.

A report on some of the American vessels captured by the armed vessels of the French republic, and carried into the various ports of the republic.

1st. The ship Alexander, Captain Woodward, with a cargo of flour, on account of the French Government, was captured on the 5th of August last, by the frigate Agricola, and brought to Rochefort, being stripped of all her crew, officers, and stores. This vessel, from extreme neglect, since her arrival at Rochefort, is in a condition unfit for sea, without undergoing considerable repairs, and remains there deprived of her people. The demand of the freight, agreeable to the charter party signed by Mr. Fauchet, has been long since, and remains, with the commission of commerce.

2d. The brigantine Olive Branch, Captain John Buffington, taken by the frigate Semillante, was conducted to L'Orient on the 30th of August, with a mixed and payable cargo; the seals remain upon her hatches; and besides having been rudely insulted by having her colors hauled down, by order of the captain of a French sloop of war, she was deprived of her crew, and ran many risks of being wrecked by the inexperience and negligence of those who were put on board her.

3d. Brigantine Polly and Nancy, captain Brien, was taken into Brest the 90th of August, after being deprived of ten of her ship's company.

4th. The brigantine Apollo, Captain Parker, taken the 90th of February, and carried to Rochefort, and not liberated till the 26th of August, has not yet been paid for, his vessel having been sent to make a report to the committee of salut public, in order that he might obtain the indemnity so justly due him.

5th. The ship Robert, Captain Whippy, taken by the Proserpine frigate, and conducted to Brest.

6th. Ship James, taken by an armed vessel, and conducted to L'Orient, in the month of August, after being deprived of many men and ten men.

7th. Schooner Ruth, Captain John Peter, taken by the frigates the Raillieuse, la Resolve, and the Insurgent, and conducted to Rochefort, after being stripped of all her crew, except the cabin boy, where she remains with her hatches closed, and the cargo (of fish) in a perishing state.

Vessels of the United States now detained in different ports, loaded on account of the republic, their contracts signed by the French Minister, and payments not obtained, or at present likely to be obtained, of Government here.

At Bordeaux, since the 6th of August, 1794, the Ariel, Captain Decator; brigantine Mary, Captain Fleming; brigantine Susannah, Captain Towers.

I have demanded payment of the cargoes of those three vessels of the commission of commerce, and was answered that the committee of finance had given an order for that purpose; but on my application to that body, I find they have not.

Arrived at Nantes in the month of August, the Goddess of Liberty, Captain Glad, and Mary, Captain Puller, 2,720 barrels of flour; the Norfolk, Captain Baron, and Bellona, Captain Brooks, 1,203 barrels of flour.

At L'Orient, 5th August, the Alexander, Captain Woodward, 1,395 barrels of flour.

At Brest, 26th August, the Polly and Nancy, Captain Bryan, loaded with flour, and three others.

At Rochefort, 3d September, brigantine Sally, Captain Grece, 1,628 barrels of flour.

All the above vessels are waiting; and though I do not get a positive denial, I can obtain no promise of payment for their cargoes.

Particular cases of American vessels.

1st. The Paragon, Captain Garrieck. I landed at St. Lucie in September, 1793, and cleared her for Amsterdam; in the month following she was stranded upon the French coast, in the Department of Montagne sur mer. The judges of the Canton of St. Jose ordered the part of the cargo damaged to be sold, and the good to be stored. The captain, after four journeys to Paris, fruitless attendance on the marine, and twelve months detention, has been forced to abandon the purchase; and since my residence here, though in the quality of proprietor as well as consul, I have not been able to obtain restitution of the property.

2d. Captain Newell arrived at Havre in the month of June, 1793, with a cargo eighty-eight thousand livres value, which he sold, and purchased to the amount of forty-seven thousand livres in articles of luxury. At the moment his vessel was taken, a decree of the National Assembly prohibiting the exportation of all merchandise whatever was Newell consequently obliged to despatch his vessel empty. Many months, however, after, he procured from the commission of commerce permission to export those goods; and at his arrival at Havre, where they lay, not finding an American vessel to be hired, he chartered a Danish one, and shipped the goods; but, applying for a clearance at the custom house, he was required not only to give approved surety of selling the goods at his particular port of residence in America, but likewise that he should ship them in an American vessel only. The hardship of the case compelled him, of course, again to Paris; and he is now in vain soliciting that he may be relieved from giving a security, that as a stranger, he cannot obtain, and being allowed to export his property in other than American vessels. He has been detained many months, at the expense, at nine pounds sterling per day.

3d. The brigantine Hope, Captain Hooper, captured and sent to Rochefort in March last, whose cargo was sold soon after the commission of commerce, has only from that time to this been able to obtain a report from the commission of commerce of the cargo; and he has been denied also all information of the payment of public and private debts.

4th. The ship Kensington, Captain Kerr, was taken by a frigate, and sent to Morlaix, the 8th April last; the commission of commerce refused to purchase his cargo, notwithstanding he has been detained in port ever since.

5th. Some time ago, the commission of commerce purchased the cargo of the brigantine Iris; but finding afterwards that the articles which composed that cargo might be bought on lower terms, they refused to comply with their contract; the proprietor therefore demanded restitution of a considerable part of his cargo remaining unsold, and offered to take the price they pleased for the part that was; this was rejected; and the captain at present can get no satisfaction whatever.

6th. The agents of the commission of commerce purchased at Havre, the cargo of the ship Fabius payable in bills on Hamburg; but after a tedious delay, they would only give him bills on Basle, pretending they could not draw on Hamburg; though they gave immediately after bills on that place to others. However, after another month's vexation and delay in this situation, Mr. Vans, the proprietor, obtained bills on Hamburg, which he has come back protested for non-payment, and the commission refuses to allow the customary damages. Mr. Vans likewise sold to their agent at Dunkirk a valuable cargo, and the sale was ratified and approved by the representative of the people, then with the northern army, and who was possessed of the power from the Convention of making unlimited purchases; still the commission of commerce oppose the fulfillment of the contract.

Vessels of the United States captured going to and coming from different ports, and their treatment by armed vessels of the republic.

1st. The ship Mary, Captain Titchton, on her passage from London to Boston, was captured by the sloop of war the Hendrick, (a prize to the French frigate the Surveillante,) Her passengers, among whom there were three American citizens, were cast into the crew of the vessel, and the cabin of the ship being entirely ransacked. The passengers, though late at night, and the sea running extremely high, were hurried into a small boat, and sent at some distance on board the ship of war. The women, of whom there were several, from the hardships they underwent, have been indisposed ever since. The ship entered Brest on the 1st of September; the passengers remain at this time on board a prison ship, and the commission of marine has not yet made a report upon the business.

2d. The ship Severn, Captain Goodrich, on her passage from Bristol to New York, with several families on board, was also captured by the Proserpine frigate, who took out of the Severn the several passengers, crew, papers, and live stock, and sent her into Brest on the 1st of September, where the passengers remain on board the prize ship called the City of L'Orient, and no report can be obtained from the commission of marine.

3d. The ship Mary, Captain Preble, was captured by the above mentioned frigate, on the 18th August, on her passage from England to America, with a number of passengers, and has experienced the same treatment in every respect that the Severn did.
FOREIGN RELATIONS. [1797.]

4th. The brigantine Theodosia, Captain Justice, was captured by a French squadron on the 14th September, and conducted to Brest, with a perishable cargo, where she remains, her hatches closed; and as yet I cannot obtain a report from the commission of marine.

5th. The schooner Roebuck, Captain Kemsman, captured by the frigates Surveillante and Fidelis, was carried into Brest in May last. Her bills of loading were given to the commission of marine at L'Orient, but not having been forwarded to the commission here, no report can be had.

6th. The ship Canton, Captain M'Ghee, captured in the East Indies in the month of October, 1793, by a French privateer, called the Isle of France.

7th. The ship Woodtrim Sis, Captain Hodgson, captured by the Jacobin and Atalanta frigates, and sent to Rochefort the 13th September, with a perishable cargo on board, and no report can yet be obtained of the commission of marine; this vessel, on her last voyage to Bordeaux, was detained nine months.

8th. The brigantine Peggy, ——, taken by an armed brigantine of the republic, was conducted to Rochefort the 5th; the captain and crew were in prison during eight days, the seals put upon the hatches, and the papers taken from the captain.

9th. The ship George, Captain Symes, captured by the frigate La Galathie, and carried into Morbih in January last, after a reasonable time, is now commanded by a neutral, which is called contraband, and prohibited. There is comprised under the name of contraband or prohibited merchandise, arms, instruments, and munitions of war of every kind, horses and their furniture, and every kind of goods, wares, and merchandise, destined for a place actually besieged, blockaded, or invested. No merchandise seized on board of neutral vessels, as belonging to enemies of the republic, shall be unloaded without delay, and, at most, within the term fixed for lay days by the charter party, which the master of the vessel may carry.

10th. The freight of enemy goods shall be paid at the rate contained in the bill of lading or charter party; and the master shall have permission to employ the amount of it in the purchase of merchandise of the growth or fabric of the republic, the exportation of which may be permitted.

11th. The master of a vessel, on board of which shall be found the merchandise above described, shall be free to deport as soon as they shall be unloaded.

12th. In case merchandise, seized as belonging to enemies, shall appear to belong to neutrals, and be declared, in consequence, not to be good prize, they shall be restored unchanged to the owner, if he shall not rather agree to sell them.

13th. The commission of marine shall immediately present to the committee of public safety a list of every native subject of the Powers with whom the French republic is at war, who may (up to this day) have been seized in neutral vessels, and their complaints shall be decided upon by particular decrees.

14th. The indemnities due to neutral masters, who have been detained at Bordeaux, in consequence of the embargo which was laid there, shall be adjusted, without delay, by the commission of marine, conformably to the decree of the committee of public safety of the 7th Germinal." This commission shall render an account, within six days, of the present situation of those claims.

15th. The commission of marine is specially charged to receive and examine the accounts which shall be presented to it by the agent of the United States, concerning the supplies which the American merchants have furnished to the administrators of St. Domingo. It shall take all necessary measures to procure for the interested the most speedy justice; and it shall present to the committee of public safety, finances, commerce, and supplies, the result of its doings on this subject.

16th. The commission of marine is charged to cause the present decree to be published in all the ports of the republic.

The commission of foreign relations shall transmit it to the agents of the republic, to the allied or neutral nations, with orders to communicate it to them.

A copy of it shall be delivered to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, to serve as an answer to the memorial presented by him on the 17th of last Fructidor.

The members of said committees united.

Extract from the register of the resolves of the Commission delegated by the French Government to the Leeward Islands.

The commission resolves that the captains of French national vessels and privateers are authorized to stop and bring into the ports of the colony American vessels bound to English ports, or coming from the said ports.

* 7th March, 1794.
The vessels which are already taken, or shall be hereafter, shall remain in the ports of the colony until they shall be otherwise ordered.

At the Cape, the 7th Frimaire, (27th November) in the fifth year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Signed on the record of the procès-verbal,

LEBLANC, President.

A statement of the claims of citizens of the United States upon the French republic, presented by Mr. Skipwith, Consul General of the United States at Paris; and also of his proceedings and remarks upon them: viz.

List of American claims settled with the French Government, by Fulwar Skipwith.

No. 1. Brig Apollo, of Boston, Captain Benjamin Parker, captured, and carried into Rochefort. Recovered an indemnity. Paid to the captain

3. Ship Governor of the zone, Captain Elias Davies Symes, captured, and carried into Morlaix. An indemnity was allowed by the committee of salut publique for her detention, to be regulated by arbitrators, who made up their award for demurrage in assignats; but by my repeated applications to the committees of Government, I obtained the payment of £3,255 sterling, in silver.

3. Schooner Trial, Captain Timothy Tuft, was detained, by embargo, at Calais. I recovered for him an indemnity. Paid to the captain

4. Ship Turner, Captain Thomas Woodward, captured, and carried into Rochefort. I obtained for him the payment of his freight; also an indemnity for demurrage of 39,676 livres specie, 3,110 assignats. The specie part was paid in assignats, with the depreciation; and I accounted to the captain for specie: besides, I had his vessel repaired at this Government's expense. Paid to the captain

5. Brig Margaret, Captain Benjamin Berry, captured, and carried into Havre. I recovered for him. Paid to the captain

Minerva, Thomas Cutts, captured, and carried into Brest. I recovered for her demurrage £2,460 sterling. Paid to the captain, in bills

7. Brig Robert, Captain Coffyn Whipple, captured, and carried into Brest. I recovered for her demurrage 36,156 livres specie; paid in assignats, at the course of exchange, and in assignats 19,100 for the captain's expenditures. Settled with the captain.

8. Ship McGilvra, Captain Hugh Gemmell, captured, and carried into Brest. I have recovered the payment of freight and demurrage, amounting to 35,661 marcs banco, and 15,000 assignats. Remitted, agreeably to the captain's orders;

9. Ship Kensington, Captain Walker Kerr, captured, and carried into Morlaix. Indemnity for demurrage recovered and paid.

10. Schooner Helen, Captain John Craft, captured, and carried into Bordeaux. His cargo of even sell was paid by the officers of Government. Recovered, in payment of his cargo, 46,321 livres specie, and for demurrage and indemnity, 13,101 livres specie, and 5,125 in assignats.

11. Brig Nancy, Captain Andrew Dunning, captured, and carried into Brest. Recovered for his demurrage and demurrage £4,460 sterling, in specie, 14,600 in assignats, and £12 sterling for two thousand staves

13. Ship Fabius, Captain Conon, captured, and carried into Bordeaux. Recovered his indemnity. Paid to the captain, to the amount of

14. Messrs. Patten and Prentis, citizens of the United States, owned half of the cargo of the Swedish ship, the Nottumjolk, captured, and carried into Brest: the price of which they recovered. I obtained for them an indemnity for their expenses, from the date of their settlement to the day of their payment, of

15. Benjamin Jarvis had the French minister Fauchet's bills on the commission of supplies, for 162,000 livres, specie; the payment of which I obtained in assignats, at the rate of exchange, and paid Mr. Jarvis in bullion.

16. The ship President, Captain John Anderson Smith, brought from Baltimore a cargo of oil, which was ordered on account of a residence in ninety and ninety-four barrels of which remained unpaid, on account of some difficulties between the supercargo and the French agents. I recovered the payment of £2,336 10s. sterling, on account of Oliver Kane, assignee of Mr. Barton.

17. The brig Eagle, Captain William Conon, came as a cartel from Jersey, with prisoners of war, to Roscoff, where she was stopped and detained. I obtained her release, with permission to sail out but no indemnity was granted, this Government referring the captain to the Power that employed him.

18. The brig Friendship, Captain Ebenezer Hoyt, arrived at Rochefort. I obtained for him the payment of his freight, amounting to 36,869 livres, specie; and also an indemnity of 19,114 livres, specie, for his detention.

19. The brig Hiram, Captain James Craig, ran aground near Boulignej she was got off, but carried into Bouligne, and detained there. I procured her release, but have not yet been able to obtain an indemnity for her detention.

20. Ship Knight Tailor had arrived from his house of Baltimore bills of citizens Le Compte and Gornon, agents of the French republic in America, to the amount of 30,000 pounds sterling. Those bills having protested for non-payment at Hamburg, I recovered the amount from the Government, 750,600 livres specie,

21. W. Welky, Captain, recovered the payment of his freight, of 8,580 dollars. Demurrage is not yet paid.

22. William Wams had made a contract with some of this Government's agents; I recovered the payment for him (all but a small part, which remains unpaid) in brandy and wines, specie.

23. John Dickey, agent of the house of Oliver and Thompson, of Baltimore, sold to the Government a cargo of hemp, iron, and lead. I recovered the payment for him, of

24. Dark Apollo, Captain M'Gruder; recovered the payment of her cargo of flour, in specie, 95 VOL. I.

I am soliciting the payment of the demurrage.

25. Messrs. Townsend, Franklin, and Sailler, made contract with the French Government; I have obtained for them arrears from the committees of Government, for the payment of, in specie, 2,239,693 00 0.

26. The brig Two Brothers, Captain Carman, delivered by contract a cargo of leather; I have obtained an arrear for the payment, in specie, of 280,596 00 0.

27. Ship Hawk, Captain Moses West, delivered at Brest, by contract, a cargo of leather; I have obtained an arrear for the payment, in specie, of 130,395 00 0.

28. Ship Olive Branch, Captain Buffington; obtained an arrear for the payment of her cargo, in specie, 147,537 00 0.

29. Only one-quarter paid.

30. The schooner Success, Captain Elias Low; her cargo of fish taken for Government use; obtained an arrear for the payment of 33,739 0 10.

31. Schooner Industry, Captain Isaiah Snow; her cargo of fish taken for Government's use; obtained an arrear for the payment of 43,200 0 0.

32. Ship Ann, Captain Coffin, delivered at Havre, by contract, a cargo of pearlashes and potatoes; obtained an arrear for the payment of, in specie, 155,567 16 0.

33. Ship Severn, Captain Gared Goodrich; obtained an arrear for the payment of her freight, in specie, 22,614 19 0.

34. One only four paid.

35. Captain Jacob Smith, of the ship General Green, sold to this Government a cargo of hemp and iron, the payment of which I recovered, independently of the amount of the iron.

36. Brig Polly, Captain Richard Christie. Obtained an order for the payment of demurrage, of 42,725 00 0.

37. Brig Henry, Captain Henry Hodge, captured and carried into Morlaix. Got so much endamaged, under the command of the prize master, that the captain abandoned her, entering his protest before the proper officer. Having previously obtained an arrear, that he delivered the vessel American property, I obtained likewise an order for another vessel of the republic, in lieu of the Henry, at the choice of the captain, who pitched upon an English prize, the Quaker. I have also obtained an indemnity for his detention, of 11,354 livres, specie, and 11,556 assignats.

38. Another one not paid.

39. Brig Four Friends, Captain Joseph Gleann. Recovered the payment of his freight, (this vessel having been captured), obtained an arrear for his indemnity, amounting to 12,014 00 0.

40. The indemnity is not yet paid.

41. Brig Theodosia, Captain John Justice, captured and carried into the Orient. I have obtained an arrear for the payment of the indemnity, of 2,600 Florins, equal in specie, to 5,777 00 0.

Claims before the Government.

39. The ship Severn, Captain Jared Goodrich, owned by Messrs. Thomas Piersall and Elijah Pell, of the city of New York, bound from Bristol to New York, was captured by the French frigate Proserpine, and carried into Brest. I obtained an arrear on the 31st day of October, 1794, which released the vessel, but condemned the greatest part of the cargo, ordering the payment of the freight of the part condemned, and an indemnity for the detention. N. B. The indemnity is fixed by the arbitrators, but not yet obtained.

Claims for the Cargo.

40. James Davy. I have claimed for him the release of the articles contained in his bill of lading, consisting of three masts of merchandise, one long bundle do, three bundle shovels, one bundle pans, and six casks of iron weights. As most of this cargo has been distributed, I want the original invoices and testimonial of the value of the articles, in order to the determination of these claims.

Messrs. Malcolm, M'Pewen and Son. I have claimed for them the release of the part of their cargo, not determined.

42. Messrs. Moses Rogers and William Woolsey. I have claimed for them the release of their part of the cargo, not determined.

43. Messrs. John Cane and Brothers. Claimed their part of the cargo, not determined.

44. Andrew Van Tuyll. Claimed his part of the cargo, not determined.

45. Messrs. Peter Goedel and Robert Hatsey Goedel. Claimed their part of the cargo, not determined.

46. Colonel A. I. Reynolds. Claimed his part of the cargo, not determined.

47. Nicholas Van Antwerp. Claimed his part of the cargo, not determined.

48. Francis Basset. Claimed his part of the cargo. The commission of Marine has answered that the property was released by the arrêt of October, 1794; it is supposed, of course, that it was re-shipped by the captain.

49. John Haster. Claimed his part of the cargo, not determined.

50. Messrs. Bredt Bown and Andrew Bowne. Claimed their part of the cargo, not determined.

51. Joseph Blackwell. Claimed his part of the cargo, not determined.

52. Thomas Cadle. Claimed his part of the cargo, not determined.

53. Stephen Debiais. Claimed his part of the cargo; original invoices and prices of the goods, copy of the bill of lading, wanting.

54. Messrs. Douglass and Roe. Claimed their part of the cargo, not determined.

55. Daniel Dunsmour. Claimed his part of the cargo. The property released, by arrear of the 26th of April, 1795. The value yet to be recovered.

56. James Farley. Claimed his part of the cargo, not determined.

57. William Grizzam. Claimed his part of the cargo, not determined.

58. John J. Glover. Claimed his part of the cargo, not determined.

59. Peter Goedel. Claimed his part of the cargo, not determined.

60. John Ever. Claimed his part of the cargo, not determined.

61. Messrs. Hallet and Bowne. Claimed their part of the cargo, not determined.

62. Andrew Hammarley. Claimed his part of the cargo. I have wrote to Birmingham for a duplicate of the invoice, that forwarded by Hammarley being so wet that no use can be made of it.
63. Uriah Hendricks. Claimed his part of the cargo. I have no invoice.
64. Messrs. Oliver and Hull. Claimed their part of the cargo; not determined.
65. John Lawrence. Claimed his part of the cargo; not determined.
66. John Dunham and Tillinghast. Claimed their part of the cargo; not determined.
67. Messrs. Hyde and Rogers. Claimed their part of the cargo; not determined.
68. Messrs. Outhout and M'Grew. Claimed their part of the cargo; not determined.
69. Messrs. Pearshall and Pell. Claimed their part of the cargo; property released by arrest of the 26th April, 1797. Invoices wanted to render the value.
70. Messrs. Thomson and M'Gregor. Claimed their part of the cargo; not determined.
71. Walter Weyrer. Claimed his part of the cargo; not determined.
72. Messrs. M'Kinzie and Varick. Claimed their part of the cargo; not determined.
73. Messrs. Underhill and Son. Claimed their part of the cargo; not determined.
74. Messrs. Alexander and John Mowatt. Claimed their part of the cargo; property released, but the value not yet recovered.
75. Schooner Lark. Captain Samuel Lovet, was captured at sea. The prize master lost both vessel and cargo, on the coast near Bayonne. I obtained an arresté, which acknowledges the property of both vessel and cargo to be American property, and orders the payment of the value thereof; which value is to be ascertained by arbitrators. The prize master is to make the payment.
76. Brig Mary, of Haverhill, Captain Jonathan Ticombe, captured and carried into Brest. Obtained an arresté which releases both vessel and cargo, and orders an indemnity for deviation and detention; the award is made up, but the order of payment not yet issued.
77. Ship Fame, Captain John Coleman, captured and carried into L'Orient. Obtained an arresté for an indemnity; the award made up, but the order of payment not yet obtained.
78. Snow Mercury, Captain George Todd, captured and carried into Morlaix, and released. The demand of an indemnity not yet answered.
79. Ship Andrew, Captain Samuel Makin, captured and carried into L'Orient. Claims made for the value of the cargo, and for an indemnity for the detention of the vessel; not determined.
80. Brig Trenton, Captain George Graham Hussey, captured by the French and retaken by the English. Claims made for indemnity on behalf of the mate William Cook, who was taken out of her and was plundered; not yet determined.
81. The Ruby, Captain Dexter, captured and carried into Morlaix. Claimed for Mr Blake the value of the cargo; not determined.
82. Mr. Thomas Hickling, acting as American consul at St. Michael. Claimed for him his half of the cargo of the Swedish ship the Nellisurfock, captured and carried into Brest; not yet determined.
83. Ship Little Cherub, Captain Rat. Bird, owned by Thomas Ramsden, captured and carried into Dunkirk. Claimed for the owners, demurrage, &c. not determined.
84. Brig Amphion, Captain Joshua Sayers, captured and carried in Cayenne. Claimed the payment of the freight; not determined.
85. Brig Hero, Captain George Frost Blunt, captured and carried into Cherbourg. An arresté orders the indemnity to be settled by arbitrators. The award giving less demurrage than what is specified in the charter party, remonstrances are put in against; not yet determined.
86. Brig Hero, Captain George Frost Blunt, captured and carried into Cherbourg. Messrs. James Burgess and Co. of Charleston. Claimed for their part of the cargo; not determined.
87. Brig Hero, Captain Blunt; Messrs. David Lanik, Montgomery. Claimed for their part of the cargo; not determined.
88. Brig Samuel, Captain Alexander Black, captured and carried into St. Malo. Part of the cargo has been end - damaged, and the other part has been damaged; claims for the damaged part and for an indemnity, is pending before the Executive commission of marine. The part of the cargo paid amounted to liv. 61,847 specie.
89. Schooner Abigail, Captain George Dunham, captured and carried into L'Orient. Obtained an arresté for the indemnity which has been awarded, but the order of payment not yet obtained.
90. Ship Union, Captain Richard Beard, captured and carried into Cherbourg. Arresté granted for the payment of the cargo and for an indemnity for detention; nothing yet paid.
91. Schooner Retrieve, Captain Daniel Jackson. Claimed part of her cargo taken by the French at Leogane, in Hispaniola; no determination.
92. Schooner Ruth, Captain John Peters, captured and carried into Rochefort. An indemnity was awarded for his detention, but the captain not being satisfied with the award, a demand is put in to overseat it.
93. Ship Ann and Susannah, Captain Richard Lane, captured and carried into L'Orient. The indemnity is awarded, but not yet obtained.
94. Captain Joshua Barney sold to this Government the cargoes of the Sidney, Ariadne, Pomona, Harmony, Fame, and Moggy. Obtained an arresté that the demurrage of these six vessels be settled by arbitrators. The award not yet made.
95. Brig Olive Branch, Captain John Ballington. Indemnity for demurrage not yet obtained.
96. Schooner Success, Captain Elias Low. The award for the indemnity made up, but the payment not yet obtained.
97. Schooner Industry, Captain Isaiah Snow. The award for the indemnity made up, not yet paid.
98. Henry Saddler. Claimed for him demurrage of the Iris, Betsey and Enterprize; not yet determined.
100. James Robert Loveston. Claimed for him the demurrage of the two brothers; not determined.
102. Ship Ann and Susannah, Captain Richard Lane. Her cargo was sold to the Government by Mr. George Blunt, in New York. Obtained the payment of it, liv. $6,300.
103. Shirt Hamilton, Captain Teer. Claimed her demurrage; not yet obtained.
105. Barque Apollo, Captain M'Gruer. Claimed demurrage; not determined.
106. Schooner Sally, Captain John Hall. Her cargo of warlike stores was delivered to the administration of Guadalupe, but not yet paid. Claimed the payment of the same; rejected by the commission of marine for want of an account liquidated at Guadalupe, and proper vouchers; a fresh claim put in notwithstanding.
107. Schooner淮安, Captain Samuel Gerrish. This vessel was cast away on the coast near Bourlgue; the Govern - ment officers seized on the property that was saved, and the committee of public safety passed an arresté, ordering the sale of the same, and that out of the proceeds the captain should receive his freight. The goods saved were sold at vendue for assignats at the maximum price, which assignats would hardly pay near one-third of the freight. I have no claim put in against the illegality of the proceeding; as contrary to the convention made between France and America; no determination.
108. Brig Triton, Captain William Ridgway, captured by the French privateer Rochastouft, and carried into Martinique. The cargo of the vessel was released, but the captain condemned to pay 2,500 liv. specie to the privateer. Granted a restitution, and an indemnity for detention. The whole rejected by the commission of marine, because the captain was not on board, nor the ship's papers, when the capture was made.
109. Brig Mary, Captain Nathaniel Haley, captured and carried into Brest. Claim is put in for an indemnity for demurrage and detention, as also the freight of the goods condemned.
110. Brig Mary, Captain Halley; Peter Goellet. Claimed for him part of the cargo.
111. Brig Mary, Captain Halley; Charles Hopkins. Claimed for him part of the cargo.
114. James Grubb. Claimed for him the payment of 66,000 livres specie, for flour delivered to the French admistration of His Majesty's vessel Jenny, of Savannah, at Bordeaux and La Rochelle.
115. Sloop Jenny, of Savannah, Dareloque, master and owners; captured and carried into Cape Francois, and condemned. Claimed the value of the sloop and cargo, but it is impossible to obtain an order of payment, without some documents to prove the value, which Mr. Dareloque has never transmitted. When the necessary papers arrive, it will be proved for an order for an amount of 66,000 livres.
116. Brig Friendship, Captain Henry Oney; supercargo, Ephraim Talbot; captured and carried into Bayonne. Claimed an indemnity.

OBSTRUCTIONS.

117. Brig Annapolis. Captain Daniel Boyer; owner, Mr. Stephen Vernon, of Philadelphia. Claimed the payment of the cargo delivered at St. Domingo. Rejected by the commission of marine, referring to the administration of St. Domingo. A new claim put in.

118. The ship Jones and Richard, of Philadelphia. Captain Edmund Nowland, entered at Bordeaux, coming from Havana to Philadelphia, to load flour, and bring cargo. He declared at the custom house that he having entered the cash he had on board, and lodged it with the consul; ready to sail, the captain took his cash on board, where it was seized. Claimed for him restitution of the same.

119. Armstrong and Barnwell, of New York. Claimed for them the payment of a bill of the French administration of St. Domingo on the French minister, near the United States, for liv. 16,325, which bill has been duly protested for refusal of payment by citizens Genet and La Forest.
120. James Vanxum, for citizen Faure. He remitted four ordonnances on the minister plenipotentiary of France near the United States, drawn at St. Domingo, to the amount of liv. 39,731. Claimed for him the payment of the same but the letter of attorney of Faure is wanted.
121. Peter La Maigre. Claimed for him the payment of six ordonnances on citizen Genet, duly protested, amounting to liv. 138,776; not determined.
122. Schooner Fairy. Capt. John Hammel, plundered by the French privateer the Little Democrat. Claimed the payment of the effects plundered accordingly to the accounts furnished; not determined.
123. Brig Mara, Captain Keyran Walsh; owned by Mr. Ebenezer Stocker, of Newburyport, Massachusetts; captured by the French Frigate Medusa, and plundered. Claimed for the effects plundered as per the accounts furnished, 2,304 dollars, accordingly to the accounts furnished.
124. Sloop Diligent, Captain John Cunningham; owned by Messrs. Solomon Wilson, George Benn, and Nathaniel Norsworthy; captured and carried into Basseterre, island of Guadaloupe. Claimed an indemnity for the dissolved effects plundered, of 873 livres.
125. Brig Thomas, Captain John SALTER. Claimed the payment of the freight from Martinico to France, for transporting a number of French sailors and soldiers.
126. Schooner Alice, Captain Joseph Gould; owned by John Bullock, of Providence, Rhode Island; captured and carried into St. Lucie, and there condemned. Claimed the value of the vessel and cargo, and an indemnity.
129. Schooner York, Captain Andrew Burke; owned by Mr. Nicholas Cruger, of New York; captured at Port au Prince; both vessel and cargo condemned. Claimed the value of the whole, and an indemnity.
130. Captain John Kirk; captured and carried into Cherbourg. An order to order the payment of an indemnity; but the award of the arbitrators is in assigns, which, by the considerable depreciation, cannot be received. I am soliciting the payment of it in specie.
131. The John, Captain Clarke; captured and carried into Cherbourg. In the same situation as the Indian Chief.
132. The Jerusha, Captain Ebenezer Giles; captured by the French, recaptured by the British. Claimed an indemnity for damages sustained whilst in the possession of the French.
133. Brig Hope, Captain Joseph Pooler. Claimed the value of the cargo and its vessel captured by the Frigate Cherbourg.
134. Sloop Rainbow, Captain Isaac Mackie; Messrs. Edward Dunnant and Joshua Gilpin. Claimed for them the payment of their accounts of flour delivered at Cape Francois, &c. &c. cargoes of the two above vessels.
136. Schooner Sally, Captain William Edgar.
137. Ship Robin, Captain John Broock, of Philadelphia. Claimed for Philip Care the payment for the cargoes of the two above vessels, as also the value of his effects burnt and destroyed in the stores of Messrs. Creven Jeune & Co.
138. Schooner James, Captain Dallstrandt; Christopher Lewis Lente, of New York. Claimed for him 153 half Johanneis freight, and 87,000 indemnity for the loss of his vessel.
139. John Burrows, of the sloop Lark, of Philadelphia. Claimed for him the payment of five colonial bills of Guadaloupe on the French minister near the United States, on the protests of the said bills. It would have been well that the first had been transmitted to my office.
140. Sloop Confidence, of Newburyport, Captain Bradbury. Claimed the value of the part of the cargo that was condemned at Port de la Liberte, island of Guadaloupe, and an indemnity.
141. Schooner Success, Captain John Watson; George Brock, a passenger. Claimed for him the effects plundered by the boat of the French Frigate Concorde.
142. Capt. Daniel ship Kraqnov, Captain Hand Paulson; John James von Klined; James Muschott. Claimed for him his part of the cargo of tobacco, the said vessel being captured and carried into Brest.
143. Brig Ennace, Captain Benjamin Carleton; John Norris, John Barr, and James Barr, owners. Claimed an indemnity for being embargoed at Brest.
144. Capt. Dewey, ship Amsterdam, Co. of New York. Claimed for them the payment of two original drafts of the administration of Port au Prince on citizen Genet, the one, No. 19, for liv. 10,381 17 9, and the other, No. 20, for liv. 8,908 17. I wish they had been protested, and the protest transmitted to my office.
145. Ship Commerce, Captain Emoc Freble. Claimed for Messrs. Smith, De Stassure, and Darrell, the price of four thousand quarts of indigo, together with the French privateer Tyger of St. Malo.
146. British brig Mary Ann, Captain John Simpson; Archibald Gracie. Claimed for him the tobacco on board, as it was shipped before the time allowed by the treaty to take notice of hostilities.
147. William Smith, for ordonnances from the French minister, in St. Domingo for 13,980 liv. specie, and that for a bond of 5,741 liv. 12 sous 6 den. signed Bonsavine, cannot be supported for want of original papers and vouchers.
148. Paul Siemens. His claim for supplies of flour and gin cannot be supported for the same reasons.
149. Fair American, Capt. Rt. Gillet. Claimed for Messrs. Vanxum and Lambrecht the amount of the cargo abandoned at Cape Francois at the time of its destruction, amounting to liv. 142,855 19 7. Claimed at the same time, for the same owners, liv. 33,695, for flour delivered at Port Republican in 1793. Claimed, likewise, for the same, liv. 19,470, for five hundred barrels of flour, sold to the administration of Portu Prince. Those three claims rejected for want of original papers and vouchers.

193. James Gamble, of Philadelphia. Claimed for him the payment of liv. 11,576 8, for the amount of a colonial draft on citizen Genet. Rejected, and the papers delivered back to Mr. Monroe.

194. Brig Kitty, Captain William Waters, owned by Stephen Girard, of Philadelphia; condemned at Basseterre, Guadeloupe. Having no official paper, not even a legal copy of the judgment, I have wrote to Mr. Girard, for the necessary papers and vouchers to support the claim.

195. Schooner Atalanta, of Washington, in North Carolina, (formerly the Washington) Captain Hugh Huston; captured, condemned, and sold at Basseterre, Guadeloupe. No official copy of the condemnation; no other paper but the Captain's protest, which is insufficient to present a claim upon.

196. Ship Favorite, supercargo, Samuel Montgomery Brown, of Philadelphia. Ship and cargo were condemned at Port au Prince for having out declared all the produce on board. Not a single official paper to support the fact; only relations of it by the supercargo.

197. Messrs. James M'Currach & Co. of Philadelphia. Two copies of drafts from Port Republican on citizen Genet. There should have been, at least, certified two copies by the French consul at Philadelphia, and they should be under a certificate of the said consul that the originals were deposited in his office.

198. Walter Stewart, of Philadelphia. His claim for livres 90,344 15, for supplies to the French Government of St. Domingo, proceeding from the cargo of the brig Active, Captain Aaron Welch, and his other claim, for 32,450 livres, for four delivered at St. Marc, are only supported by copies of ordnances, certified by a public notary, which is not sufficient.

199. Bartholomew Sarrazin, of Philadelphia. His claim for property destroyed at the Cape is not supported by affidavits of indifferent persons, of the amount and value of it, or by any other testimony than his own.

200. Brig Brothers, Captain John Baptist Smith, owned by James Barry, of Philadelphia. There is only the captain's protest of his being taken by a French letter of marque, the Ca Irma, Captain Paris, fitted out at Charleston, and carried into St. Bartholomew, whence the captain fled before condemnation. No claim can be supported without the assistance of some other evidence.

201. Schooner Misty, Captain Frederick King. No other paper but the protest to prove that the cargo, left in the hands of Michael Levy, Aux Cayes, was taken by the orders of the Commissary Polverelli, and not paid for.

202. Messrs. Nicholas Cruger, George Codwise, and Joseph Rose. The copies of three ordnances of Guadalupe, on citizen Genet, not sufficient to obtain payments; claims suspended for want of vouchers, original papers, or copies or certified papers.

203. Schooner Polly, Captain Matthew Price, captured by the French privateer Narbonnaire, and carried into Port au Prince, where the cargo was condemned.

204. Amphion, Petit and Bayard, of Philadelphia. Copy of an ordnance from Port Republican on citizen Genet, on account of pork, proceeding from the cargo of the schooner Industry, and oil, of the schooner Franklin, delivered at the Cape, and on account of property left at the Cape at the time of its destruction; but no pieces of evidence or vouchers to support any part of the claim.

205. John Mayben, of Philadelphia. Several copies of ordnances from the French West India Islands; but no original paper to support a demand of payment.

206. Sloop Mary Anne, of New Haven, Captain William Brentnall. Nothing but the copy of a declaration, on oath, of the mate and one of the hands, that the said vessel was plundered by the French, and then captured by the British.

207. Schooner Polly, of Washington, in North Carolina, Captain Nathaniel Willis. Freight and cargo plundered by a French privateer; no other paper to ground a demand but upon the protest.

208. Schooner Lacey, Captain Louden Bailey. The captain's account of what the administration of Port au Paix, island of St. Domingo, allowed him for his cargo, and what it would have fetched at the current price; no evidence to support the fact.

209. Schooner Betsey, Captain John Murphy. Mr. William Patterson, of Baltimore, has transmitted an account of the cargo belonging to him, taken by the municipality of Ponte à Pétre, but no evidence to support the demand of payment.

210. James Saddler. Claimed his part of the cargo; not determined.

211. Metropolitan, Tapp, Allam, and Lee. Claimed their part of the cargo; property released by arrêté of 26th April, 1796; invoices wanted to recover the value.

In witness of the foregoing being a true statement of the one hundred and seventy American claims, as there- in respectively described, and as will appear to be supported upon the various documents deposited in the chancery of my office, I have hereunto affixed my name and seal of office, at Paris, this 20th day of November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, and of American independence the two hundred and twentith.

In witness of the foregoing being a true and exact copy of the original deposited in the chancery of my office,

[LS.]

I have hereunto affixed my name and seal of office, at Paris, this 20th day of November, 1795, and of American Independence, the twentieth.

FULWAR SKIPWITH.
I, JOSIAH HEMPIEST, late master of the brigantine Patty, which, with her cargo, were the property of Justus Riley, merchant, of Wethersfield, in the State of Connecticut, testify and declare, that I sailed in said brigantine from New London to the same State, on the 14th day of July last, bound to the Island of St. Bartholomew's: that, on the second day of September following, being in the latitude of seventeen degrees and twenty-four minutes north of the equator, according to my observations, I was captured by a French cruiser, called the Iris, Lemot captain, and carried into Guadaloupe, arriving on the fifth of said September at Basseterre: that on the same day I was taken before Victor Hugues, whose first words addressed to me were these: "I have conscripted your vessel and cargo, you damned rascal," doubling his fist and running it close to my face; and he continued talking for some time, reviling the Government and people of the United States: that, on the 8th of September, I applied to Victor Hugues to be informed when my vessel and cargo were to be tried, and he answered, that they had been already tried, and I might go about my business. I then requested a paper to produce to my owner as evidence of the capture and condemnation of his vessel and cargo, which was granted: that I twice applied to Victor Hugues to allow me something to enable myself and people to leave the island, but could obtain nothing. I further certify, and the sloop Lucy, George Gilbert, master, belonging to Norwich, in Connecticut, was carried into Basseterre on the same day with the brigantine Patty, and, with her cargo, was condemned, without the examination of a single paper, which remained in the hands of Captain Gilbert till after sentence of condemnation had been pronounced: that, when I took into my hands Captain Gilbert's orders from his owners and attempted to read them in the hearing of Victor Hugues, he would not hear them. The next day the same orders were carried to the linguist, to present to Victor Hugues; but, in the afternoon, the linguist brought them back to Captain Gilbert, saying that Victor Hugues would not receive them. The orders showed that Captain Gilbert was to perform a voyage to St. Croix, with liberty to touch at St. Bartholomew's, but was not to deviate from those orders, because the sloop was chartered for those two ports only, and that insurance was made accordingly.

JOHNSON HEMPIEST.

CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, 8th.

On the ninth day of November, Anno Domini, 1796, before me, Hilary Baker, mayor of the city of Philadelphia, personally appeared the within named Josiah Hempiest, who being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, doth solemnly declare and depose, that all and every the facts stated in the within declaration, by him this day before me subscribed, are true. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, the day and year aforesaid.

HILARY BAKER, Mayor. [L. s.]

F. EQUALITY. LIBERTY.

Extract from the Registers of the Special Agency of the Executive Directory to the Windward Islands.

The special agents of the executive directory to the Windward Islands:

Considering that the laws as well ancient as modern, forbid neutrals to carry to the enemy contraband or prohibited merchandises:

Considering that, notwithstanding the complaints of the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States of North America, of which he has informed us by his letter of the 20 July, 1796, those States, and especially Virginia, have fitted out vessels loaded with horses for the English:

Decree, that from this day forward, all vessels loaded with merchandises designated by the name of contraband, as arms, ammunition, wearing apparel, and provisions of all sorts of which kinds silver, horses, and their furniture, shall be stopped by the ships of war and privateers, to be seized and conscripted for the benefit of the captors.

At Basseterre, Guadaloupe, the 1st August, 1796. Signed on the register.

VICTOR HUGUES—LEBAS.

Compared with the register.

VAUCHELET, Secretary of the agency.

F. EQUALITY. LIBERTY.

The Special Agents of the Executive Directory to the Windward Islands.

Considering that the ports of the Windward and Leeward Islands, as well as those of Demarara, Essequibo, and Berbice, delivered up to the English, occupied and defended by enigrants, are in a state of regular siege, and not entitled to the same advantages as the ports of the different English colonies, possessed by that Power before the war, or to other rights.

Considering that it is against every principle to treat a horde of insurgents, destitute of country, without government, and without a flag, with the same respect as civilized nations preserve towards each other during a war.

Considering that, by the authentic acts which are in our possession, it is proved that the divers places of the colonies delivered up to the English by the rebel Frenchmen and Batavians no more belong to the British Government than the Vendée, in which the English ministry had, in like manner, mercenary troops under pay,—some regiments clad in the same uniform as those of England: considering that, in virtue of the 3rd article of the treaty of alliance, concluded at Paris on the 5th of February, 1778, between the United States and France, the former Power engaged to defend the American possessions in case of war, and that the Government and the commerce of the United States are always open to the inhabitants of the republic of France, in turning to its injury the favors granted to them of trading in all the ports of the French colonies.

That, by permitting neutral vessels any longer to carry provisions of war and of subsistence to men, evidently in state of rebellion, would be to prolong civil war, and the calamities and crimes flowing therefrom,—decree as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The ships of the republic and French privateers are authorized to capture and conduct into the ports of the republic and French privateers destined for the Windward and Leeward Islands of America, delivered up to the English, occupied and defended by the enigrants. These ports are, Martinico, St. Lucic, Tobago, Demarara, Berbice, Essequibo.

And at the Leeward, Port au Prince, St. Mark's, P'Archays, and Jeremie.

ART. 2. Every armed vessel, having a commission from either of the said ports, shall be reputed a pirate, and the property of the vessel, and the cargoes on board, shall be confiscated to the government.

ART. 3. The vessels and cargoes described in the 1st and 2d articles are declared good prize, and shall be sold for the benefit of the captors.

ART. 4. Every captured vessel, which shall have cleared out under the vague denomination of West Indies, is comprehended in the 1st and 2d articles.

ART. 5. The decree of the 4th of last Nivose, in pursuance of the resolution of the executive directory, of the 14th Messor, 4th year, shall be executed till further orders, as far as shall not be contravened by the present decree.
This decree shall be printed, transcribed in the register of the criminal and commercial tribunals, sent to all the French colonial ports, read, published, and posted up, wherever it may be necessary.

It shall be notified officially to the neutral Governments of St. Croix, St. Thomas, and St. Bartholomew's.

Enjoining the criminal and commercial tribunals of Guadaloupe, their delegations in the different French colonies and elsewhere, the rear-admiral commandant on the West India station, and the head of the administration, to aid in executing the present decree, each in his respective department.

Done at Basseeterre, island of Guadaloupe, the 13th of Pluviose, 5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

VICTOR HUGUES & LEBAS.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, the memorial and petition of the subscribers, citizens of the United States, dwelling in Philadelphia, respectfully shew:

That your memorialists, and divers others, in the regular course of their trade, in the years 1793, 1794, and 1795, invested very large sums of money in provisions and other merchandizes suited to the West India market, and sent them thither, where many cargoes were sold to the officers of colonial administration of the republic of France, to be paid for in cash or colonial produce; many others were taken by force or the said officers from the supercargoes and consignees, at prices arbitrarily fixed by themselves, to be paid for in produce at rates and terms of credit fixed at their pleasure, and that others have been arrested on the high seas, carried into their ports, and taken for the use of the republic without any stipulated price or contract: that your memorialists confidently believe, that the amount of property belonging to the citizens of the United States, thus delivered to, and taken by, the administrative bodies of the French republic in the West Indies, exceeds two millions of dollars now in arrear, for which your memorialists and others concerned, have no mode of obtaining payment, satisfaction, or redress; that the usual course is, after taking the cargo by force and duress, to detain the vessels under pretence of paying in produce, until the masters and crew are wearied with sickness, delay, and insult, so as to be willing to return, either altogether without payment, or with such small portion thereof, as scarcely to pay the freight and charges occasioned by these long delays, whereby, in most instances, the whole capital has been left behind, and in those instances, where a considerable part of the cargo has been paid for in colonial produce, the expenses of demurrage have consumed almost the whole, as by vouchers ready to be laid before the House, or a committee thereof, will abundantly appear.

Your memorialist further show, that some of the earliest sufferers among them applied personally, and by memorials, to citizens Genet, Fauchet, and Adet, the first and succeeding ministers of the French republic, for redress, without obtaining it: they also applied, by memorial, to the President of the United States, who referred them to the Secretary for the Department of State, whose advice they pursued in committing their claims to James Monroe, Esq. minister plenipotentiary of the United States to the republic of France, at the time of his embarkation. That, although your memorialists are perfectly satisfied that the executive authority of the Union hath done all within its power to procure redress to your memorialists, yet it has not had the desired effect.

Your memorialists further represent, that they had hoped that some arrangement would have been assented to, whereby, the debts due from the republic of France to the citizens of America might have been discharged, out of the debt due to her from the United States, and, under this expectation, they exercised patience, but finding that money funded and transferred to an agent of the republic, all hope, from that resource, is vanished: your memorialists feel the more concern that, while provision has been made by the Executive of the Union for obtaining from other nations a redress for spoliations committed on their commerce, no measures hitherto adopted have been successful for procuring satisfaction from that nation, which the merchants of this city have so decidedly an affection to, by supplying their islands with provisions and necessaries, at a greater risk than attended any other branch of their trade, supplies that were absolutely necessary to their colonies, and which they could, from no other place, nor in any other manner, be furnished with.

Your memorialists therefore pray, that the Legislature will take their suffering case into consideration, and afford them such relief and protection as to their wisdom shall seem consistent with right and justice.

Philip & Thomas Reilly,
Sam. A. Otis, on behalf of
Sam. A. Ous, jun.
Rd. Glimer & Co.
Mr. Livingston, from the committee appointed on the 9th December last, to inquire into the operation of the act for the relief and protection of American seamen, and to report what amendments are necessary to be made thereto, made the following report:

That, from the neglect of the collectors of the different ports, to transmit the returns directed by the said act to the Secretary of State, it is difficult to present any precise result of the operation of the law to the House.

For the quarter ending with the 30th of September, 1796, the collectors of the following ports only had made the return of impressments directed by the 7th section of the act aforesaid, viz: Providence, (Rhode Island) Washington, South Quay, Ipswich, Dighton, and Philadelphia.

For the succeeding quarter, ending the 31st of December, 1796, the returns were made on this subject only by the collectors of Philadelphia, Ipswich, Dighton, Providence, (Rhode Island) verbally by the collector of Boston.

It, however, appears, from the communication received from the Secretary of State, and annexed to this report, that affidavits have been transmitted to his office, taken, as well pursuant to the 5th section of the said act, as under the direction of a circular letter written from that department on the 25th of March last, and that from those documents there appear to have been impressed, by British ships of war and press-gangs, from on board American vessels, 114 seamen:

Of whom 54 are citizens of the United States, twenty-nine of whom whose States are particularly designated in the returns.
12 natives of Great Britain or Ireland.
19 foreigners, natives of other countries than Great-Britain or Ireland.
29 whose citizenship is uncertain.

Total, 114

The same neglect of the collectors, to make the proper returns, has prevented your committee from procuring and submitting to the House an accurate statement of the number of seamen enregistered pursuant to the 4th section of the said act. It appears however, that, in the two quarters preceding the 1st of January, 1797, there were registered by the several collectors who have completed their returns, the number of 4,892 seamen—

Of whom 4,633 are native Americans.
304 citizens by residence prior to the 3d of September, 1793.
41 naturalized citizens.

Total, 4,892

As to the operation of part of the law, directing the appointment of agents to reside in foreign ports, your committee report that no regular returns have been received from the said agents of the number of impressed seamen they have been able to discharge; but they understand, generally, that the law has operated beneficially in this respect.

Your committee also further report, that they have examined the suggestions contained in the letter annexed to the report from the Secretary of State, on the subject of the allowance to sick, disabled, or needy American seamen, in foreign ports; and are of opinion that some further legislative provision is necessary for their support; and, as connected with that subject, that some provision is necessary for the relief and support of such disabled or invalid seamen as may arrive at the different ports of the United States.

The committee find that numbers of seamen, as well foreigners as natives, arriving at the different ports of the United States, in such disabled situation, either become a great burden to the public hospitals, where any such are established, or are left to perish for want of proper attention.

They are of opinion that a sufficient fund might be raised for the support and relief of sick or disabled American seamen, as well in foreign ports as in the United States; either by an additional tonnage duty on all vessels entering the ports of the United States, or by a charge on the wages of all seamen shipped within the United States, proportioned to the length of the voyage, to be paid or secured by the master, and deducted from the wages of his crew.

The committee, therefore, in relation to the several objects above specified, recommend the following resolutions, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to lay before this House, at its next meeting, an abstract of all the returns which shall then have been made to him, by the collectors of the different ports, pursuant to the directions of the act for the relief and protection of American seamen; and also such communications from the agents employed by virtue of the said act, in foreign ports, as may then be received.

Resolved, That, instead of the allowance directed to be made by the act, "concerning consuls and vice-consuls," for the relief and support of American seamen in foreign ports, provision ought to be made, by law, for allowing the sum of thirty cents per day, to each man, and for defraying the expense of transporting sick or disabled seamen to the United States.

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for collecting the sum of— cents, per month, from the wages of every seaman sailing from any port of the United States, to be appropriated—
1. To the temporary support and relief of sick or disabled seamen of the United States;
2. To the foundation of hospitals for the relief of such sick or disabled seamen, (when a sufficient fund shall be collected.)

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, FEBRUARY 17, 1797.

Sir:
I have the honor to enclose, agreeably to your request, a copy, marked A, of the instructions prescribed by the President of the United States, relative to the proofs of citizenship, and mode of taking the same, to entitle the applicants to be registered as American seamen. An abstract, marked B, of the returns received from different collectors, of the seamen they have registered pursuant to the act of Congress. The committee will observe, that a number of the collectors have made no returns. A statement, marked C, of seamen impressed or detained by foreign Powers, extracted from the returns of the collectors. Copies, marked D, of returns of impressments, from the collector of Pennsylvania; and an account, marked E, of such protests as have been transmitted to my office, relative to impressed seamen, as well in pursuance of the fifth section of the act for the relief and protection of our seamen, as in compliance with my request, in a circular letter sent to the collectors, in March, 1796. The dates of the protests, compared with the date of the President’s instructions, transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to the collectors, will indicate what protests have been returned pursuant to the act of Congress.

I have no particular information to communicate on the operation of the act in question, having heard no complaints of difficulties or inconveniences in executing it. But, in other respects, our seamen need more effectual protection and support.

By the consular act, every master of an American vessel is required to receive and bring home, at least two of our seamen whom he may find in foreign ports, for every hundred tons burthen of his vessel, without compensation other than the service of the seamen, on their passage, if able to work; and if he refuses to receive them, the consul of the place is authorized to prosecute him for a penalty of thirty dollars, in any court of competent jurisdiction, for every seaman so refused. Now, if the master wants seamen, he will gladly ship them as part of his crew; if he is full manned, to receive them will be inconvenient to him, or, at least, a burden on his owners; and, in such cases, the master will continue to evade the law, and our seamen will suffer, if not be lost to their country. Besides, in many foreign ports we have no consuls, and the penalty mentioned is incurred only when the master refuses to receive the seamen on the request or order of the consul. And in what courts are our consuls, resident in foreign countries, to prosecute the delinquents? I have asked the Attorney General’s opinion. He answers: in the courts of the United States. The provision for such prosecutions may, then, be considered as a nullity.

Why should not compensation be given to encourage the bringing home of destitute seamen? A very small duty on every vessel, or on every seaman, (as formerly they were taxed for the support of Greenwich hospital) would furnish an adequate fund.

The consular act also authorizes our consuls to support our needy or sick seamen in foreign ports, but restricts the allowance to twelve cents a day, a sum that in but few ports in Europe would procure them a single meal; and, as to the sick, they must be left to perish, unless the consuls, at their own expense, provide clothing, nurses, and physicians. And who is to bury the dead? Funeral expenses, in many places, are considerable.

Our consuls have been in the practice of giving certificates to protect our seamen from impressments. These certificates have formerly been respected, with some exceptions. Lord Greenville has complained to Mr. King of numerous abuses by such protections, being given to British subjects. It is highly probable that some abuses have taken place; yet, as seamen sometimes lose their protections, it seems necessary that the consuls should continue to give them. The consuls of other nations do the same, and the difference of language is a guard against frauds. Perhaps some rules might be prescribed to the consuls for their direction, to prevent abuses which, by bringing the consular acts into disreput, will destroy their usefulness. The fee taken by the consuls, (some few, I believe, issue the certificates gratis) is two dollars for each protection. This seems too burthensome on the seamen; and if, after all, carelessness, or other fault in some consuls in issuing certificates, should destroy the faith which ought to be given to the consular seal, the evil will be greatly increased.

These hints, written at your request, I submit to the consideration of the committee,

And am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

EDWARD LIVINGSTON, Esq. Chairman of the Committee of the House of Representatives, on the act for the relief and protection of American seamen.

C.

A Statement of Seamen belonging to ships and vessels of the United States, impressed or detained by foreign Powers, taken from the returns of the Consular Officers of the United States, of the quarter ending the 30th September, 1796, in pursuance of the seventh section of the “act for the relief and protection of American Seamen.”

Return of the collector of Providence, Rhode Island: That Benjamin Phillips, master of the ship Rebecca, of Providence, who entered, on the 17th September last, from the Havannah, had two of his seamen impressed on his passage thence.

Return of the collector of Washington: That there were none.

Return of the collector of South Quay: That there were none.

Return of the collector of Ipswich: That there were none.

Return of the collector of Dighton: That there were none.

The foregoing are all the returns yet received relative to impressments and detentions, for the quarter aforesaid, except that from Pennsylvania district, a copy of which is annexed to this Marked D.

On the 39th of March, and previous to the passing of the act above mentioned, the Secretary of State had addressed a circular letter to the collectors of the principal ports in the United States, requesting them to take and transmit to him affidavits relative to impressments, and other outrages committed on citizens of the United States, by British ships of war. Of this they have continued to make return with much precision, whether the affidavits transmitted were pursuant to the act of Congress, or the circular letter; and as returns of registered seamen have been made by many collectors who do not, at the same time, notice the impressments and detentions which may have taken place, it is probable that they considered the transmission of the affidavits themselves, as superseding the necessity of a formal return. An account of those affidavits or protests, as far as they come within the meaning of the act, will be found in the paper marked E.

A Statement of Seamen belonging to ships and vessels of the United States, impressed or detained by foreign Powers, taken from the returns of Collectors of the Customs, to the Secretary of State, for the quarter ending with the 31st December, 1796, in pursuance of the seventh section of the “act for the relief and protection of American Seamen.”

The collector of Ipswich: That there were none.

The collector of Dighton: That there were none.

The collector of Providence, Rhode Island: That one seaman had been impressed from on board the brigantine Betsy, of Providence, Zachariah Rhodes, master, on the 4th August, 1796, at Port-au-Prince, by the British ship of Indostan, captain Boxst; but he was afterwards restored.

The collector of Boston reported personally to the Secretary of State: That, in his district, he had received no information of the impressment of a single seaman.

The return of the collector of Providence is annexed, marked DD.

6. Protest of James Lowell, master of the brig Union, of Newburyport, dated Newburyport, 8th July, 1796.

9. Protest of James Snell, a native of England, was impressed on board the said brigantine, on the 7th of July, 1796, at Antone in Jamaica, by the British sloop of war called the Cormorant.

10. Protest of Daniel Cee, supposed to be a native of England, who called himself a native of Virginia, was impressed at Liverpool, whilst he was engaged as seaman on board the said brigantine, on or about the 20th of April, 1796, and carried on board the British ship of war Acteon.

13. Protest of John Singleton, who said he was born at Newburyport, and another man, who was supposed to be a native of New England, were impressed on board the said ship on the 9th September, 1796, on a voyage from Havana to Providence, by the British ship of war Ceris, Captain John Newman.

Thomas Pettit, supposed to be an Irishman, and William Williams, supposed to be a Welchman, were impressed from the said ship on the 5th August, 1796, on a voyage from Dublin to New York, by a British ship of war, supposed to be the Cleopatra, Captain Penrose.

17. Protest of James Laughton, master of the ship Orlando, dated at New York, 13th October, 1796.

John Patten, a native of Massachusetts, and John Dowling, an Irishman, were impressed from the said ship at Cowes, in the Isle of Wight, on the 5th May, 1796, into the British service.

18. Affidavit of George Nowell, master of the ship Rebecca, dated at Norfolk, in Virginia, 6th August, 1796.

Richard Hallyard, a native of Philadelphia, was impressed from on board said ship, about ten leagues from Cape Henry, by the British frigate Theis, commanded by Captain Cochran. The Rebecca was then bound to Norfolk from Newburyport, whence she had departed on the 18th July, 1796.

19. Protest of John D. Bourne, master of the sloop Industry, of Charleston, South Carolina, dated at Charleston, 10th October, 1796.

That the said sloop was captured on the 27th July preceding, on a voyage from Charleston to Surinam, by the British ship of war Scipio, commanded by Sir Charles Sidney Davers, who ordered all the sloop's people on board the Scipio. The sloop was carried to Martinico without her people. Their names were John Collins, master; Frederick Robert, John Contrey, Christopher Jacob, and Isacc Moran, who is a citizen of the United States.

James Moor, a native of Whitehaven, in England, was impressed from on board the said brigantine, on the 9th September, 1796, at Granada, by His Britannic Majesty's ship Alarm, Captain Fellows.

Peter Coleman and Andrew Swanson, both Swedes, were impressed at Port Royal, in Jamaica, on the 8th September, 1796, from on board the said brigantine, by His Britannic Majesty's ship Alfred.

22. Protest of William Roberts, master of the schooner Sally, of Norfolk, dated at Norfolk, 10th October, 1796. Elisha Carter, a native of Rhode Island, was impressed from on board the said schooner, on the 9th August preceding, by the British ship of war Sampson.

23. Protest of James Deale, master of the ship Louis, dated at Norfolk, 31st July, 1796. Five seamen were impressed from on board the said ship, on the 18th of the same month, on a voyage from Baltimore to the Isle of France, about five leagues to the eastward of Cape Henry, by the British ship of war Prevoyante.

George Higginbottom, a native of Baltimore, and John Sands, a citizen of the United States, were impressed from on board the said ship, on the 7th of the same August, on a voyage from Bremen to Baltimore, about fifteen miles from Cape Henry, by the British ship of war Le Prevoyante, Captain Wemys.

25. Protest of Bartholomew Byers, master of the schooner Sisters, of Baltimore, dated at Baltimore, 9th September, 1796.

William Hampton, a native of the United States, was taken out of the said schooner, on the 7th August, 1796, on a voyage from Cape Fraunces to Baltimore, off the Bahamas, by two British privates; the one called the Hornet, Captain Steel, and the other called the Endeavour, Captain Fgog.

26. Protest of James Boyd, master of the schooner Betsy of Baltimore, dated 17th August, 1796. William Forrest, a citizen of the United States, was impressed from on board the said schooner, on a voyage from Jeremie to Baltimore, on the 1st of the same August, by the British ship of war Prevoyante.

27. Protest of Henry Tyson, master of the ship John, of Baltimore, dated at Baltimore, 4th August, 1796.

George Riley, a citizen of the United States, was impressed from on board the said ship, on the 15th December, 1796, on a voyage from Baltimore to Dublin, by Admiral Murray's ship, the Resolution. Afterwards, on her return, on the 19th July, 1796, James Watts, a passenger, and Brian Riley, the cook, a citizen of the United States, were impressed from the said ship, by the British ship of war Prevoyante.

28. Protest of Joseph Dexter, of the brigantine Polly, of Boston, dated at Baltimore, 26th July, 1796. James Grey, Joseph Dexter, and William Rogers, all citizens of the United States, were impressed from on board the said brigantine, on the 17th of the same July, on a voyage from Boston to Baltimore, off Cape Charles, three miles, by the ship of war Prevoyante.

29. Protest of John Smith, master of the ship Ardent of Baltimore, Baltimore, 14th September, 1796.

William Harly and William Hogue, both citizens of the United States, were impressed from on board the said ship, on the 6th of the same August, on a voyage from Liverpool to Baltimore, eight leagues off Cape Henry, by the British ship of war Prevoyante, Captain Wemys.

30. Protest of David Alden, master of the ship Thomas, of Portland, dated at Baltimore, 15th August, 1796. William Edwards, Richard Pasco, and Joseph Gibbons, all citizens and natives of the United States, were impressed from the service of the said ship, at Martinique, whilst they were on shore, some time subsequent to the 10th of April, by a gang from the British frigate Amible, Captain Davers.

Mason, his successor as Secretary of State, report of, on depredations committed by Great Britain, France, and Spain, on American commerce, letter from, to Mr. Fauchet, on the subject of an advance to France, on account of the debt of the United States, to Mr. Fauchet, on the subject of his report on the vexations committed by France on the commerce of the United States, to Mr. Hammond, in vindication of the neutral rights of the United States, bound on the subject of contraband by the law of nations, to Governor Shelby, in relation to his duties to suppress movements on the part of any citizens of Kentucky against the dominions of Spain; the constitutional and legal rights of the Government of the Union; and the measures taken to obtain from Spain the free navigation of the Mississippi, Transmits an abstract of the vexations and spoliations on American commerce, to Mr. Hammond, on the alleged excitement of the Indians to hostilities, by Lord Dorchester, to Mr. Hammond, relating to his complaints against alleged acts of violence by the citizens of Vermont, to Mr. Hammond, in reply to his letter of the 23d May; enforcing his previous views of Lord Dorchester’s conduct; justifying the measures pursued by the United States to enforce their neutrality; and rebutting the accusation of partiality to France, to John Jay; caution necessary in his communications with the French minister; the probable dispositions and conduct of Mr. Hammond; recapitulation of his acts; Governor Simcoe’s letter; Lord Dorchester’s speech to the Indians; impartiality towards France, to Mr. Jay, respecting papers, to Mr. Jay; sends papers and documents, to Mr. Jay; Admiral Jervis; his system of plunder and cruelty against American commerce in the West Indies; the success of Mr. Jay necessary to preserve peace, to Mr. Jay; encloses the cases of the Sukey and Maria, to Mr. Jay, explanatory of the circumstance of the departure of a vessel for France during the embargo, sends copies of the cases of British spoliations; animadverts on Mr. Hammond’s diplomatic proceedings; cautions him against crediting his representations, to Mr. Jay; encloses record of the cases of capture of American vessels, to Mr. Jay; last letter to Mr. Hammond; reports credited that the British abet the Indians, transmits Mr. Hammond’s letter of July 30, 1794, proofs of the strict neutrality of the United States; opposition to the exile in Pennsylvania; measures taken to suppress insurrection; and general feelings and state of the country, recommending Mr. James King, the owner of the schooner Nancy, to his attention, 1793, November 25, 2042, 1794, January 10, 402, 1796, March 2, 493, 494, 1794, March 19, 497, 1794, April 3, 492, 1794, May 1, 450, 1794, March 29, 496, 1794, May 29, 491, 1794, April 20, 463, 1794, June 2, 465, 1794, June 27, 474, 1794, May 28, 475, 1794, May 29, 475, 1794, June 8, 475, 1794, July 9, 475, 1794, July 9, 478, 1794, July 10, 1794, July 15, 1794, July 30, 1794, August 11, 482, 1794, August 15, 483
INDEX TO FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Randolph, Edmund, Secretary of State—The disposition of the President contrasted with proofs of British hostility since its invasion; British associated with hostile Indians; Mr. Hammond's disposition to complain; the only person who remains uniformed of Governor Simcoe's seizure of the Rapids of the Miami.

The reprehensible conduct of Governor Simcoe; intentional indecorum of Mr. Hammond; probable issue of the insurrection; That the insurrection may be expected to terminate without bloodshed.

Directs his attention to particular papers, explanatory of the movements of the insurrectionists, and reviews the reasons which render their prospects of success hopeless.

Entertains little hope of his success, from the complexion of the British ministry, and the movements of Lord Dorchester and Governor Simcoe; the result of the Western insurrection, though not yet ascertained, will be favorable to the permanency of the General Government.

To Mr. Jay the principle and the extent of indemnification for captures; details respecting the conduct and temper which the President thinks should be avoided by an American minister; the President approves of the temporary agreement; state of the insurrection.

The different statute laws of Virginia, anterior and subsequent to the Revolution, respecting the recovery of debts; popular impudence in America; that Mr. Jay has power of negotiation for agents for the merchants; difficulty in procuring records of condemnations; yellow fever.

Military opposition from insurgents not expected; reasons for not publishing Mr. Jay's No. 10.

Mr. Bayard goes to England as agent concerning the appeal; no military opposition shown by the insurgents.

Mr. Marshall, of Virginia, confirms his statement respecting the law relating to the recovery of debts.

Congress form no quorum.

Suggestions respecting indemnities for spoliations.

Amendments on Lord Grenville's reasoning concerning the negroes; questions Mr. Jay's accuracy respecting the time of surrendering the posts; other points of the projected treaty criticised.

Further remarks on private commissions; the negroes; and the posts.

Examines more particularly the articles of the project which he considers objectionable; reviews the provisions respecting the negroes, the posts, compensation for captures; West India trade; and boundary; and, excepting the last he expresses dissatisfaction with all.

To D. Humphreys: peace with Algiers.

Same; further instructions concerning the terms of the peace with Algiers, same.

Same.

To Thomas Pinckney, envoy extraordinary to Spain; his nomination, appointment, and return to London.

To Mr. Fauchet; that the case of the prize to the Sans Pareil has been inquired into; assurances that in all cases justice will be enforced by the American Government.

That the prize of the Sans Pareil has been restored.

Desires to see the record of the court before interfering in the case of a prize restored.

Declaration of, respecting a communication with Mr. Fauchet.

To Mr. Ade, containing a defence of the treaty with Great Britain, of 1794, and an account of the objections of the French minister.

To Mr. Fauchet, on the alleged insult to the French privateer Favorite.

To the District Attorney of New York, on the subject of the alleged insult to the Favorite.

To Mr. Fauchet, communicating instructions given by the Government, proceeding from an investigation of facts respecting the Favorite.

Encloses a copy of a letter from the Collector of New York relating to the Favorite.

That the French privateer Carmagnole, illegally fitted out in the United States, must be dismantled.

Transmits a copy of the rules adopted by the Government of the United States, for the enforcement of their neutral rights, and the fulfilment of their neutral obligations; that the Carmagnole (or Columbia) still continues to disregard them.

To Mr. Fauchet, advert to an exceptional paragraph in his letter of Aug. 21; reminds him of the measures adopted by the American Government in relation to Genet; and enforces the construction already given to the treaty with France.

States the causes which have prevented the Government from repeating instructions which had been issued to Governor Lee.

To the Lieutenant Governor of Virginia, requests the enforcement of the treaty with France, prohibiting British vessels of war from bringing French prizes into the ports of the United States.

Encloses instructions to the Governors of the States, to respect and enforce the treaties with France.

Transmits a letter from the Lieutenant Governor of Virginia; states the measures taken in relation to the British frigate Terschelling.

Communicates, as a reply, a copy of his letter to the Governor of Virginia; urges the most speedy and effectual measures to enforce the observance of the treaty with France.

Transmits letters received from the Governor of Virginia, showing the measures taken to prevent British ships of war from bringing prizes into the ports of the United States.

To Mr. Fauchet, that his letter of the 2d May had been submitted to the President, who has examined, himself, every ground of complaint; proceeds to comment on several allegations, tending to charge the United States with a predilection for Great Britain; classifies the cases of restored prizes; justifies their restitution; places the measures of France and Great Britain in their just light; and vindicates the Government against the charge of injustice towards one, and weak submission towards the other.

Randolph, Edmund, Secretary of State—To Mr. Fauchet, (but sent to Mr. Adey,) to his general denunciations, or misstatements, he opposes the examination of all the instances, or facts on which their course to be founded for this analysis, an argument is deduced in favor of the strict impartiality, justice, and wisdom of the American Government, —

To the District Attorney of New York, respecting the French privateer La Vengeance, —

Enclosing to Mr. Adet papers respecting the privateer La Vengeance, —

To Mr. Fauchet, accepts the tender of the friendly services of France to effect a settlement of differences with the Dey of Algiers, —

To Mr. Adet, asks for the decrees upon which the proposed commercial arrangements are to be based; inquires whether he has power to conclude, as well as negotiate, a treaty; and declares his readiness to enter into the negotiation.

Reiterates the request contained in his note of July 1,

Proposes to enter on the negotiation for a commercial treaty, notwithstanding Mr. Adet's limited powers,

Suggests the expediency of conducting the negotiation chiefly in writing, and states the mode by which the negotiation may be carried on, and the objects to which their attention should be directed,

To Mr. Monroe, communicating instructions on his departure as minister to France: recommending parties: recall of Mr. Genet and Mr. Morris: in what way the neutrality of the United States benefits France: mission of Mr. Jay: he is forbidden to weaken existing engagements with France: policy of France, if the United States should be drawn into the war; the determination of the President to remain unconnected with either France or England; French exiles; Fauchet; information, statistical, moral, and political, required, as to the state of France; subjects which Mr. Monroe must refer to the heads of the Government; subjects for his own action; indemnification for captures; success to St. Domingo sufferers; drafts for supplies; consular appointments; friendship of France; navigation of the Mississippi, how it may be secured,

That he be an allowance for supplies furnished the St. Domingo exiles; and the liberation of American prisoners; consular appointments; interpretation of France to effect a peace with Algiers; indemnification to be obtained for French spoliations; to speak in a firm and decisive, but prudent and friendly tone,

Transmits the address of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States to the French Convention,

Letter of, to Mr. Monroe; recapitulation of subjects to be brought forward; spoliations; violations of treaty; ship Laurens; effects of Houdreau's embargo; ship Fame; other claims; condition of the United States; general spirit awakened by the insurrection in Pennsylvania; Mr. Jay restricted; little hope of an adjustment with Great Britain; mutual interests of France and the United States; conduct of Spain,

The unfavorable impression produced by his address to the Convention, and the theatre and ceremonies of his reception; the neutral character of the United States apparently overlooked; remarks on his suggestion that he had not been instructed to obtain the repeal of the decree which violated the 35th and 34th articles of the treaty, or to insist on the execution of the treaty; urged to do so,

His letters of 18th and 25th August are received; his declining to accept the House is approved; instructed to cultivate the friendship of France, without compromising the neutrality of the United States,

Uncertainty as to the intentions of France; the friendship and impartiality of the United States not to be doubted; the terms of the treaty with Great Britain not a just cause of uneasiness or complaint, Consular property; Mr. Jay's treaty has arrived; the rights of France are preserved; the adjustment of other questions, whether commercial or territorial, concerns the United States alone; the St. Domingo supplies; the proposed concert noticed,

Refers to his private letter of Dec. 18the treaty with Great Britain neither offensive nor defensive; independence upon all foreign nations the policy of the President; necessity for an adherence to principle; anxiety to be informed fully on the subject of the proposed concert,

General review of the policy and measures of the United States towards France; the state of France; neutrality of the United States; motives for maintaining; restrictions and spoliations of France upon American commerce; a set commercial treaty desired by the United States; professed by France: instructions to Genet; propositions by Mr. Adet; a close alliance the object of France; Jay's treaty, within the scope of a friendly and neutral policy towards France; attempts to defeat the British treaty; the firm determination of the President,

To Mr. Monroe, transmits the treaty made by Mr. Jay, and correspondence with Mr. Adet; the treaty will not be ratified until its return from England, if then,

Public sentiment upon the treaty; its ratification doubtful; the provision orders of Great Britain increase the objections; conjectures respecting the determination of the President,
